The PRESIDENT pro tempore. While the Chair thinks the precedents are the other way, he supposes there might be exceptional cases by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I had reference to, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I started to ask that by unanimous consent the nomination referred to be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And considered in open executive session?

Mr. STONE. And considered as in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I report from the Committee on the Judiciary the nomination which I send to the desk and ask for its confirmation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the nomination.

The Secretary read as follows:

Charles F. Curley, of Wilmington, Del., to be United States attorney for the district of Delaware, vice John P. Nields, whose term has expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inquire as to when that nomination was referred to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was referred on the day before yesterday, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the nomination will be confirmed. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The President of the United States will be notified, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was about to suggest that the President must be notified, in order that the appointment may be made out before Monday.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to set myself right. I merely desire to say that there was a mistake about the nomination which has just been confirmed having been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was on the desk here day before yesterday, and I thought that in executive session it had been referred; but at the request of the Senator from Delaware I polled the Judiciary Committee, and they authorized me to report the nomination favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The impression of the Chair was that the nomination had never been formally presented to the committee, but that is a mere informality that has been cured by unanimous consent.

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, yesterday I had laid before the Senate Senate resolution 107, and I wish now to call that resolution to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 107) reported by Mr. LEA of Tennessee, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, on the 9th instant, relative to leasing Osage oil lands.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the senior Senator from Oklahoma yield to his colleague?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to make a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma will state it.

Mr. GORE. If the request is that the resolution be laid before the Senate by unanimous consent, I desire to interpose an objection. The question would then come up on the motion to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution has been reported and is on the calendar. It is rather a question of taking it from the calendar now than of being a resolution coming over from a former day. It will therefore be necessary for the senior Senator from Oklahoma to change his request and to make a motion to proceed to its consideration. The resolution is not on the President's desk as coming over as a matter of course, but, as stated, it is now on the calendar, having been reported.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 107.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Has this resolution ever been submitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. It has been favorably reported from that committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the senior Senator from Oklahoma yield to his colleague?

Mr. OLIVER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is this motion debatable at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable until 2 o'clock. The attention of the Chair is called to the fact that a motion to proceed to the consideration of any matter on the calendar is not debatable if taken up before 2 o'clock. The question is on the adoption of the motion submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, what is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 107.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask if we can not have unanimous consent to proceed to a discussion of that motion? I had no disposition yesterday nor have I to-day to preclude the discussion of the pending resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the pending question may be debated at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. OWEN. I object.

Mr. OLIVER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Oklahoma objects.

Mr. GORE. I doubt the presence of a quorum, and I raise that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Gronna	Norris	Sterling
Beckham	Hughes	O'Gorman	Stone
Brandegee	James	Oliver	Sutherland
Broussard	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Swanson
Catron	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Thompson
Clapp	Kern	Phelan	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Walsh
Colt	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Warren
Culberson	Lewis	Sherman	Williams
Cummins	McCumber	Simmons	Works
Curtis	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Fall	Myers	Smith, S. C.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]; also the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. These announcements may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GORE. Is the pending motion to take up resolution 107 for present consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. GORE. I shall interpose no further objection at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 107.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, by the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs I reported on February 21 Senate Resolution 107 in lieu of Senate Resolution 4, introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. For the information of the Senate I should like to read the resolution as now reported to the Senate. It is as follows:

Resolved, That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to refrain for a period of two years, or until further action by Congress, from making any disposition by lease or sale of such quarter-section units of the lands on the Osage Reservation in the State of Oklahoma, as have been developed by oil operators either under leases or subleases as are now producing oil, except such units as are now held by lessees who have accepted the terms of the resolution of the Osage Council of June 17, 1915, for leases to be made direct to them. Said developed lands thus withheld from lease after the expiration of the term of the existing oil lease may continue to be operated by the present oil operators who are now in possession of and operating the same at a royalty of not less than one-sixth on all leases of quarter-section units when the average production is less than 25 barrels per well per day and a royalty of not less than one-fifth on all such leases when the average production exceeds 25 barrels per well per day, all royalties to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Osage Nation of Indians.

That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, through a subcommittee of five members to be chosen by it, be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to fully investigate the subject of the leasing of said lands and the methods of controlling and marketing the oil production of the Osage Reservation in Oklahoma and all affairs connected therewith, and that the said committee be empowered to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during vacation; and said committee shall make full and complete report, together with its recommendation to the Senate. The necessary expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

This is not a difficult nor involved matter so far as it lies before the Senate. Twenty years ago fifteen hundred thousand acres of Osage land were leased under act of Congress for oil purposes. That lease was renewed 10 years ago by act of Congress as to 680,000 acres, and will expire on the 16th of March, 1916. One hundred and forty-one of the sublessees who drilled upon these lands, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, have not received back the funds which they invested in this attempted development, and only 12 of them have succeeded in securing a return above the capital invested. (Hearings, p. 205.) The Osage Council insisted that on the termination of the lease, March 16, 1916, the persons who had developed this territory had no preferential rights to renewal or equity whatever; that these lands should be sold at public auction; that the wells which had been drilled carried no preferential rights to renewal or equity to those who had drilled them. In answer to that the operators contended that the universal rule of all oil fields with producers and owners, lessors and lessees, has always been that those who develop an oil well had the right, until the oil ceased to exist in paying quantities, to a preferential right of re-lease of that property on terms to be agreed upon, even when the lease itself does not in express terms stipulate the right of renewal.

The Congress of the United States laid down this principle of recognizing the right of new lease in the act of June 28, 1898, in instructing the Secretary of the Interior to give preference right to lease to prior lessee in making leases of lands of the Five Civilized Tribes contiguous to the Osage territory. That practice was followed by Congress in 1906 at the termination of the 10-year lease on the Osage lands.

It is the universal practice wherever oil fields exist that a term lease shall be renewed to the lessee upon terms to be agreed upon as long as the oil is found in paying quantities, even when not so provided in the written contract, thus giving the lessee producing oil in paying quantities the preferential right to a new lease. The oil wells of this field have a life of from 8 to 10 years. In that time the oil becomes so small in quantity as not to be worth pumping. The oil men rely upon what they call "fixed production," the production after 12 months from drilling a well, to compensate them for the capital invested, and their speculative profits come out of what is called the "flush production," a production which comes out during the first 12 months after they succeed in finding productive oil sand.

Two years before the expiration of this lease—which expires, as I say, next week, on March 16—the oil men took up the question of a renewal with the Department of the Interior, and had many conferences with regard to it. The department was most patient and careful in making that investigation. From those conferences the oil men, without any written authority, and without any express declaration on the part of the department, drew the inference that the customary practice of releasing oil lands would be followed out by the department. One of the departmental officers, named Carroll, wrote a circular letter (hearings, p. 262) to these operators from which they inferred—perhaps not justly, but certainly from fairly good reason—that they would be recognized according to the number of wells they had; and many of them, upon that letter, drilled additional wells.

The greatest by far of all the operators in that field was Theodore N. Barnsdall, an old operator, and an operator from his early youth, who had drilled wells in West Virginia and in Ohio and in other fields; and in order to develop these lands he borrowed a large amount of money—$7,500,000—from the Standard Oil Co. (hearings, p. 11), for whom he had drilled lands in previous years. They, as pledgee, held millions of dollars of Barnsdall's personal stocks and bonds to guarantee the return of the loan to Barnsdall's operating company, the Barnsdall Oil Co.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly tell us whether this money was borrowed by Mr. Barnsdall after the impression was given out, as he states, by the Secretary of the Interior, or from his office, that the leases would be renewed, or was the money borrowed many years before that time?

Mr. OWEN. The money was borrowed when he began to operate in the Osage field.

Mr. REED. Many years ago?

Mr. OWEN. Many years ago—I think about 1906. He put up many millions of dollars of his own securities outside of the money which he intended to invest in this field. The evidence was submitted to the committee that the Standard Oil Co. had no interest in Barnsdall's dividends in the Barnsdall Oil Co. except as pledgee; that they sold his private stocks with a view to reducing his debt. This man seems to have spent over $10,000,000 in acquiring leases, paying royalties, and in drilling wells in the Osage country. He drilled and operated over 1,200 wells, at a cost of nearly $7,000,000; and when the statement was made up, January 31, 1915, he was still in arrears over $1,100,000. He had not gotten his capital back by that much after operating there for over 10 years.

The suggestion was made that perhaps the Standard Oil Co. had some interest in this, and, therefore, that the Standard Oil Co. might be properly rebuked as a general public enemy by refusing to Barnsdall recognition of the preference right of renewal to the wells he had drilled. His claim to a preference right, and the claim to a preference right of others to the wells they have actually drilled in the Osage country, was on the ground of the universal custom and practice in the oil fields, on the ground of the precedent set by Congress in the act of June 28, 1898, recognizing the preference right by statute, and the act of 1906 authorizing the renewal of the leases in the Osage country, and the belief on the part of all these men that the Interior Department would recognize their right to a renewal of leases on the producing wells they had developed and their own large expenditures in drilling wells in this field in the last three years of the lease on this reliance and with no suggestion of danger given them either by the Osages or by the department officers.

During the last two years, at a time when no hope could be entertained of the capital being paid back out of the settled production of these wells, the Barnsdall Oil Co. expended approximately $2,000,000 under the influence of this conviction. It is absolutely incredible that they would have made such an expenditure except under the conviction that they should be permitted, upon reasonable terms, the preferential right of a renewal of the lease on the wells so developed.

The Barnsdall Oil Co., proceeding upon the theory that Congress had first allowed 1,500,000 acres to be let in one lease in 1896, and 680,000 acres in another renewal lease by authority of Congress in 1906, had bought up various sublessees' rights in this area, and then they made this expenditure of approximately $2,000,000 within two years in drilling wells just before the conclusion of the lease. The Osages discovering they had a technical legal right to sell all leases to the highest bidder demanded that no preferential right to a new lease be recognized in any of their lessees. The Osage Council by law makes the leases, and with this advantage they were in a position to drive a hard bargain and coerce all their lessees and to coerce the department itself to yield to their demands.

The policy of the Government wisely changed from these large holdings of leased lands of 1896 and 1906 to smaller holdings. I myself advocated the policy of making these holdings in smaller areas. They were reduced to 4,800 acres. The department acted wisely and justly in that respect, since it afforded a larger opportunity to smaller men to enter this field of investment. But cutting down the amount from 680,000 acres to 4,800 acres worked an unnecessary hardship upon Theodore Barnsdall, who had been a large operator. Under the new policy now proposed to be inaugurated on March 16, 1916—next week—a number of leases were made of 4,800 acres each to persons who had made no development whatever. Barnsdall, under the new rule, is permitted, through the Barnsdall Oil Co., to obtain 4,800 acres. He has interests in other companies which are permitted to make leases of the same amount, but there remains, over and above the acreage which is permitted to this company, somewhere in the neighborhood 20,000 acres of land which they have developed out of what might be properly called "wildcat" territory, the settled production of which is to be taken from them on the theory that they have no equity. The 4,800-acre rule is merely a rule of policy and convenience and is not intended to be, and is not in fact, without important exceptions. It is proposed to entirely disregard the 4,800-acre rule in selling the acreage advertised, to wit, 16,740 acres.

The Committee on Indian Affairs thought the operators had an equity, a preference right to a renewal of leases on equal terms offered by others, and thought that pending the ascertainment of what would be a just and proper arrangement the matter should be left to the discretion of the Secretary under the suggestion of Senate resolution 107, while it was being inquired into and a report made at the next session of this Congress; and that is the substantial recommendation of this resolution—that the committee shall investigate the matter, and that in the meantime the Secretary be requested to permit the operators who developed the wells upon the 16,740 acres which were to be sold to operate that area at an increased royalty, not less than a sixth or a fifth and at such higher rate as he chose, until that report can be made to the Senate and action taken thereon.

I should have explained to the Senate that on June 17, 1915, the Osage Council, which had taken the broad position primarily that none of these operators had ethical or moral rights or equities conceded with the Department of the Interior, that they did have, and that they all were entitled to a renewal of their leases, with the exception of 16,740 acres, nearly all of which was developed by Barnsdall Oil Co. There were two classes of lands in that 16,740 acres. Fifteen thousand acres of "surplus," so-called, nearly all of which were the lands developed by the Barnsdall Oil Co., and which so-called "surplus" was the surplus of an operator which exceeded 4,800 acres—the rule which applied generally but not exclusively under the new regulation. The Osages took the ground that Barnsdall and a few others who had "surplus," so-called, should not be allowed any more than 4,800 acres in order that these lands, some 15,000 acres, might, on this charge of being "surplus," be put up and sold at public auction to the fancied advantage of the Osages in getting some quick cash, because these lands have a very large cash value. I do not know just what the value is. Probably several million dollars would not be an unreasonable estimate of the values in these 15,000 acres of land.

There was 1,760 acres in other groups of wells which exceeded 25 barrels per well per unit of 160 acres—they deal with this question in units of 160 acres—so that if 10 wells produced 250 barrels a day, it would be an average of 25 barrels per well per unit on that 160 acres. As to those lands, of which there were 1,740 acres, the Osage Council demanded that as a minimum that much should be sold for their immediate benefit, and that the preference right of renewal of those who had made this fortunate discovery should be disregarded, and an arbitrary line was thus drawn between 24 barrels and 25 barrels in the Osage resolutions of June 17, 1915, upon their selfish demand. Those who had wells bearing less than 25 barrels per well per unit had their preference right recognized. Those who had 25 barrels or more had their preference right denied. It was an arbitrary rule necessary to obtain the acquiescence of the Osages in recognizing the preference right of other and smaller operators to release the producing wells they had developed.

It was an arbitrary rule, and unavoidably so, if that demand of the Osage Council should be recognized. The department officials did what they thought the best they could with it. They had a very difficult proposition to draw a line between the demands of the Osages that there should be no recognition of the equity of any of these operators, and to draw it so as to recognize the equities of all of those except Barnsdall and those who had wells producing in excess of 25 barrels.

Your committee thought that the Osages had been unfair in their demand to disregard the preference right of the faithful and useful tenants who had developed the lands involved in the 16,740 acres, and thought that by suggesting a royalty of not less than one-fifth, 20 per cent—a higher royalty than prevails anywhere else in the oil fields—these persons who had developed these values for the Osages would in that way have an opportunity of being fairly reimbursed and compensated for the development of these values for the Osage people, if the Secretary consented and used his influence with the Osages.

A resolution came before the committee and was ordered reported, in which it was proposed that all of these lands should be re-leased for a term not exceeding five years. This resolution was reconsidered and Senate resolution 107 reported in lieu thereof. This proposal, made by the Senator from Wisconsin, just referred to, was as follows:

Senate resolution.

Whereas the Department of the Interior, through its representative at the Osage Agency in Oklahoma, having in view the fact that the present lessees of the oil rights of the Osage Indians would terminate on March 16, 1916, and that it was the desire of the lessees to secure a renewal of said leases, did, on the 11th day of December, 1914, write said lessees as follows:

"Schedules are being prepared to be used at the hearing as to the renewal of the so-called Foster lease before the honorable Secretary of the Interior in Washington in the immediate future. It is the desire of this office that each lessee be given full credit for all the development done upon the acreage charged to him up to December 31, 1914. To this end we suggest that a statement be mailed to this office at once (if no change will take place between now and December 31) showing the dry oil and gas, and the gas wells in service commercially, if any, upon each separate lot or section or division thereof, charged to you.

"The renewal, if any, will be based upon the records as shown by this office. It therefore behooves each lessee that we are furnished with the correct information at once"; and

Whereas it appears that at that time the leased area of the Osage lands was divided into "lots" varying in area from a small acreage to several sections, which lots were, when leased singly, the smallest unit for development, and where more than one of these lots were included in a lease, the total leased area became the unit of development; and

Whereas thereafter and on February 22, 1915, the said representatives of the Department of the Interior wrote the various lessees who had within their leased areas "lots" upon which no development of any character had been made, calling attention to these undeveloped lots, and then stating:

"You are advised that the records in this office show that no development of any character has been performed upon the above-described property, and in order that the office may be fully informed, will you please advise me by March 1, 1915, if possible, why this tract has not been tested"; and

Whereas on August 26, 1915, the Secretary of the Interior promulgated "regulations to cover the leasing of lands in the Osage Indian Reservation in Oklahoma for oil and gas mining purposes," among which regulations was the following:

"2. Any such sublessee who in good faith shall have made an effort prior to October 1, 1915, to develop any lands under the Foster lease for oil, and shall have drilled one or more wells thereon, even though such wells may have resulted in dry holes, will be granted a new oil lease on the expiration of the Foster lease, on March 16, 1916, under the conditions set forth in sections 3 to 9 of these regulations, provided acceptance of the resolution of the tribal council dated June 17, 1915, is filed with the superintendent not later than September 1, 1915.

"3. Any such sublessee may select from his present holdings and obtain an oil lease embracing not to exceed 4,800 acres of land in quarter-section units, according to the public survey, or in fractional parts of such units where the present sublease does not cover a full quarter section, units the producing wells of which were capable of averaging 25 or more barrels of oil per day on July 1, 1915, which units shall be released to the Osage Tribe on March 16, 1916, together with all other producing and nonproducing properties held by each such sublessee in excess of 4,800 acres; and

Whereas on October 30, 1915, the representative of the Interior Department at the Osage Agency in Oklahoma wrote these various lessees notifying them that he was in receipt of a telegram from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as follows:

"Section 9 of Osage Regulations amended to permit filing plats not later than December 1 as to undeveloped lands"; and

Whereas many of said lessees have, pursuant to these various suggestions and invitations by the representatives of the Interior Department, drilled wells and made other development within the past two years upon the apparently reasonable presumption that their leases would be so extended as to include their oil production; and

Whereas because under these rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior their leases will be limited to 4,800 acres, composed of developed units of 160 acres each, the wells of which shall not average more than 25 barrels per day, some of them are compelled to abandon producing territory which has been recently developed by them; and

Whereas under the statements contained in the above-quoted correspondence and under the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior they were led to believe that they would be granted an extension of their leases; and

Whereas they have accepted in many instances the terms prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, have executed leases, and have complied with all of the requirements set forth in the rules and regulations and are, notwithstanding the fact that no leases have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, possessed of certain equities deserving protection: Therefore be it

Resolved, That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate and further action by Congress the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to make no sale of oil leases and to make no oil leases on the lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma except to the present lessees, and for only the areas now held by them, and for a term of five years from and after March 15, 1916, said leases to be upon a royalty of one-sixth and to be made and operated under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; such royalties to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Osage Nation of Indians: Provided, That such leases and possession thereunder shall not be made the basis for further equities at the termination of the period therein prescribed; and be it further

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, through a subcommittee of five members to be chosen by it, be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to fully investigate the methods of controlling and marketing the oil production of the Osage Reservation in Oklahoma and all affairs connected therewith, and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during vacation; and said committee shall make full and complete report, together with its recommendation, to the Senate. The necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

That resolution would have resulted, in my judgment, in very greatly reducing the royalties to the Osages, and would have the effect, if carried out, of preventing any further development in the Osage country, because it would take away, after five years, the fixed production upon which all oil operators rely for the return of their capital.

I think I have fairly and justly stated what the situation is. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I believe that these persons have moral and ethical rights that ought to be recognized. I think the proposal of the committee fairly meets the matter. I merely call attention to the record, which discloses that this scheme to disregard the preference rights of these faithful tenants was based on the selfish demand of the Osages, and that this arrangement was made on the authority of the Osage Council resolution of June 17, 1915, passed without giving these Osage tenants any chance to amend or protest or be heard before the council. I call attention to the resolution of June 17, and I submit it to the RECORD:

Resolution of Osage Tribal Council.

Whereas the so-called Foster lease, now owned by the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. and its sublessees, covering 680,000 acres in the Osage Reservation, Okla., will expire on the 16th day of March, 1916: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Osage Tribal Council, now in session at Washington, D. C., this 17th day of June, 1915, That the following recommendations be, and are hereby, made to the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the leasing of said lands:

1. That the Congress of the United States be asked to extend the trust period, which under existing law will expire on April 8, 1931.

2. In all oil leases provision shall be made for the Government to have the option to purchase the oil, or any part thereof, at the highest posted market price on the date of sale.

3. The Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. shall be eliminated as an intermediary.

4. Oil and gas rights shall be leased separately, and oil leases shall be made for a term of five years from date of approval by the Secretary of the Interior and as much longer thereafter as oil is found in paying quantities, but the term of leases shall not extend beyond the time the title to the minerals remains in the Osage Tribe.

5. Oil leases shall be made direct to the present sublessees covering their present holdings in quarter-section units not exceeding 4,800 acres each in the aggregate, except such quarter-section units the producing wells of which are capable of averaging 25 or more barrels per day on July 1, 1915, which units shall be retained by the tribe and offered for lease at public auction to the highest bidder, subject to the approval of and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; the average daily production to be ascertained under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

6. The rate of royalty on oil to be one-sixth, except where the average daily production of producing wells on any quarter-section unit shall equal or exceed 100 barrels for calendar-month periods; the royalty on such wells to be one-fifth.

7. Oil lessees shall, within 12 months after the approval of a lease by the Secretary of the Interior, drill a well on each nonproducing quarter-section unit or pay in lieu thereof a rental of $1 per acre per year.

8. All producing lands not leased to present lessees shall be offered for lease to highest bidders upon the expiration of present leases and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

9. Gas leases shall be made by the tribal council to the present gas lessees covering all or part of their present holdings and for such periods as the Secretary of the Interior may determine: Provided, That applications made prior to this date for leases of gas may be granted in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

10. The royalty on gas shall be one-sixth, and all contracts for the sale or use of gas shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Such contracts shall be transmitted to the superintendent of the Osage Agency, who shall forward same without recommendation to the Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Before any contract is approved, the superintendent shall be notified of the terms which the Secretary will approve and the superintendent will thereupon notify the principal chief, who will then convene the tribal council and inform the members of the terms of the proposed contract. The council may within 10 days from the receipt of such notice by the superintendent communicate to the Secretary, through the superintendent and the commissioner, their views with reference to the said contract.

11. The present sublessees will be notified of the terms upon which new leases may be made, and they shall file with the superintendent not later than August 1, 1915, their acceptance. Should any sublessee neglect or decline to file his acceptance on or before August 1, 1915, all lands he might acquire under new leases shall, on the expiration of the present lease, be offered to the highest bidder, in the discretion of and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The above plan provides for new oil leases to the present sublessees covering an aggregate area of about 70,000 acres of producing territory and approximately 165,000 acres of nonproducing territory, the latter being subject to a rental of $1 per acre per annum in lieu of development.

Such quarter-section units as are capable of an average daily well production of 25 barrels or more, together with about 16,000 acres of additional producing territory, shall be leased at public auction to the highest bidder, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The remaining 430,000 acres of nonproducing territory shall be leased at such times and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Secretary of the Interior.

That only goes to the effect of making this demand; and the question now is whether or not the Osages shall have the approval of the Senate of the United States in rejecting the preferential rights of a renewal lease to some of their tenants.

Of course, it is very easy for Senators who may be opposed to this matter to conduct a filibuster against it and thus prevent the favorable vote by the Senate, which they show by a filibuster they fear, if the Senate be willing to permit that to be done. I was informed this morning that representatives and lobbyists of the Osages claimed that they had an arrangement made by which a successful filibuster would be carried on against Senate resolution No. 107, by Senators who were not on the Indian Committee and who lend a willing ear to the Osage pleaders but who have not done the Indian Committee the honor to advise it of their views. I do not care for anything more than the opinion of the Senate. I shall mildly regret a filibuster which wishes to stifle that opinion. This is a matter which does not concern me in any way whatever, except as a Senator of the United States, attempting to see justice done between the white children and the red children of the people of the United States. I represent the Committee on Indian Affairs in presenting this matter to the Senate, and, having discharged my duty under the instruction of your committee, I submit the matter to the Senate.

I submit to the RECORD various telegrams sent the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and to myself bearing on this question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I have been asked to look into this matter. I have not at all concluded my labors, and I was in hope that this question would go over to some other day. I am not a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is therefore necessary for me, if I make preparation, to go through the hearings and the various reports. I have done that in a desultory manner, but not in that careful way in which I should like to, if time permits it.

The Senator from Oklahoma has made his statement now to the Senate and his remarks will be in the RECORD for the information of the Senate and will be read by those who are not here to-day. Hence I wish to ask him if he would not be willing to let this matter go over until Monday morning? That will give some time for investigation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the matter be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday.

Mr. OLIVER. And voted upon on that day?

Mr. OWEN. I shall be glad to have it voted upon on that day, if the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. REED. Of course I can not make any agreement, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent that it may be disposed of on Monday.

Mr. GORE. I object to any agreement as to a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is going to be a unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. REED. It would be entirely agreeable to me to vote on that day.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the junior Senator from Oklahoma to object?

Mr. GORE. To that part of the agreement as to a vote; yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, these lands are advertised for sale on Wednesday next, and if this resolution is to be disposed of it ought to be disposed of at once.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the sale, as I understand, has been postponed until the 20th of April.

Mr. OLIVER. I had not heard of that, Mr. President. In the meantime we do not know what is to be the status of these lessees after the 16th of March when their leases expire.

Mr. GORE. I think that is entirely true.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me this matter ought to be disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. REED. So far as I am concerned I simply desire time to look into the matter. I am entirely willing that the Senate shall vote on next Monday as soon as the debate is closed, but, of course, I can not control that.

I have no special interest in this matter, but I want to look into it. I have been asked to look into it by people who are interested; and it involves, as I understand, a good many million dollars. So I make the request of the Senator from Oklahoma, who seems to be willing to accede to the request, but desires to add to it a unanimous-consent agreement that the question shall be disposed of on Monday. I do not know whether the Senate would be willing to grant that consent or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LANE in the chair). Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GORE. I object to the request with reference to a vote.

Mr. President, I promise the Senate to be brief in my remarks. I ask Senators to find upon their desks the hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs in relation to the pending resolution. On page 27 they will find at the top of the page language from a report by the Secretary of the Interior submitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs at the request of its chairman on this subject. The Secretary of the Interior declares that—

> The apparent purpose of this resolution is that the Barnsdall Oil Co. may secure valuable property belonging to the Osage Tribe in excess of the acreage permitted under the tribal resolution and the regulations of this department without competition and without compensation.

Mr. President, those are the two points to which I am opposed and which account for my opposition to the pending resolution. I am not willing that the Senate of the United States by a mere Senate resolution, not an enactment of the Congress, not a joint resolution requiring the approval of the Senate and the House of Representatives, not even a concurrent resolution——

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not contemplated by this resolution that there shall be a royalty paid in addition to the royalty which was contemplated by——

Mr. GORE. The pending resolution brought into the Senate by the Committee on Indian Affairs imposes worse terms to these Indians than Mr. Barnsdall himself proposes to pay. In his statement before the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I believe is on page 214–215 of the document lying upon Senators' desks, Mr. Barnsdall said he was willing to give one-fifth royalty through and through for all the properties involved.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I know that the Senator would not deliberately misrepresent things.

Mr. GORE. Certainly not.

Mr. OLIVER. It will be found upon examination here that the offer of Mr. Barnsdall was based on the renewal of his entire holdings, amounting to nearly 300,000 acres.

Mr. GORE. On pages 214–215 Mr. Barnsdall states that he is willing to give to the Osage Tribe of Indians one-fifth royalty on all his producing properties, but under the pending resolution Mr. Barnsdall would be required to give only one-fifth and one-sixth of their own oil in consideration of five-fifths and six-sixths of their own oil. It is a good deal like the man who employed some boys to help him get driftwood out of the river and agreed to give them half the logs they would get out of the water. That is the proposition involved in this resolution.

The Secretary of the Interior says, on page 22 of this document, that Mr. Barnsdall has no legal right to the properties involved in this resolution. On the 16th day of this month these oil properties revert to the Osage Tribe of Indians absolutely and without any reservation and without any right on the part of Mr. Barnsdall, on the part of the Gypsy Oil Co., or on the part of Mr. Foster and his partners.

This is the point I wish to impress, Mr. President. It is that Mr. Barnsdall offered to give the Osages one-fifth of all their oil in exchange for four-fifths of the oil remaining. That is a most gracious offer. Too often the Indians have received such consideration at the hands of the white man. I ask Senators to consult the document as I proceed. Let me repeat, as I go on, that I am opposed to turning over any of this property to Mr. Barnsdall or the Gypsy Co. "without competition and without compensation."

The Senator from Oklahoma urges an argument here that, in my judgment, is absolutely fatal to his conclusion. He says it is a general custom in the oil country in Oklahoma to reserve the privilege of re-lease, or renewal of the lease. That is a custom; the right is written in the lease. It is a custom in the Creek country; it is a custom in the Cherokee country; but what means this exception from that custom? It is not an accidental exception? It is an intentional exception. In 1896, when the first 10-year lease was entered into involving the Osage oil lands, the Osage council pledged itself to a renewal of the lease in case it should prove satisfactory. But, sir, in 1906, they made no such pledge, and when the Congress of the United States renewed the lease the Congress itself gave no assurance, made no pledge, that this lease should be renewed at the expiration of the 10 years.

That is the more significant in view of the acts cited by the Senator, passed by Congress in 1898, not in relation to the Osages but in relation to the Five Civilized Tribes. The policy was there declared that leases should be renewed and that that policy should be pursued in respect to the oil lands of the Five Tribes, but those were small leases of a quarter section or such a matter. But here, Senators, were 1,500,000 acres which places it in an entirely different category. That is one of the reasons, I have no doubt, why the privilege of re-lease was omitted from the lease and from the congressional act renewing it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say that the pending resolution was less favorable to the Indians than the resolution introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania. His resolution related to T. N. Barnsdall alone. But under the terms of the pending resolution not only Mr. Barnsdall, but the Gypsy Oil Co., Foster & Brennan, and one or two other small concerns can qualify. The value of the property involved is more than twice as much as that involved under the Oliver resolution, which will be taken from the Osage Tribe of Indians, without competition and without compensation.

Mr. Barnsdall controls now 334,000 acres of the Osage Reservation. The Secretary of the Interior, opposing the policy of large holdings, has formulated a new plan, under which no lessee will be allowed to take more than 4,800 acres, a policy long pursued in the Creek and Cherokee country, and now intended to be applied to the Osage country. It is a shield against monopoly.

But, sir, Mr. Barnsdall was the sole, single exception to this limitation of 4,800 acres. It is true, as the Senator from Oklahoma said, that Mr. Barnsdall claims 4,800 acres and has 4,800 acres reserved in the name of his company. Mr. Barnsdall does not oppose, but accepts, the plan of the Secretary of the Interior in so far as it is favorable to him. He opposes it only where it is favorable to the Indians.

In addition to Mr. Barnsdall's 4,800 acres under the general plan, he had joint interest with a number of other holders, which could not easily be segregated without business confusion. Out of consideration for that fact the Secretary and the Osage Council allowed Mr. Barnsdall to receive 23,240 acres more than any other lessee in the Osage country. He has under the existing plan a reservation of 28,000 acres of oil lands. He accepts that along with the other lessees. He is not willing to accept a proposition where the remaining lands shall be turned over to the Indians on the 16th of this month, as was contemplated and provided by the law when it passed the Congress of the United States.

I do not know the value of this land claimed by Mr. Barnsdall under this resolution. The production which would go to Mr. Barnsdall under the resolution, without competition and without compensation, is 3,500 barrels of oil a day. It is worth $1.40 a barrel. That would be something like five or six thousand dollars a day taken from the Osage Indians, according to the Secretary of the Interior, and turned over to Mr. Barnsdall without competition and without compensation. Alas for poor Lo!

The Gypsy Oil Co., which is another beneficiary under this resolution, has a production amounting to 5,800 barrels a day, which reverts to the Osage Tribe of Indians on the 16th day of this month, unless this resolution should pass and prevent the reversion. It is worth $1.40 a barrel, about $8,000 every time the sun rises and sets. This resolution, if observed, would transfer from the Osage Tribe of Indians unto the Gypsy Oil Co. $8,000 daily without competition and without compensation.

There is another beneficiary, the firm of Foster & Brennan, but that amounts to only a couple of thousand dollars a day, and I shall therefore not analyze the figures in detail. It is too small an amount to trifle with; but it goes, if this resolution goes, without compensation and without competition from the Osage Tribe of Indians, the wards of this great Government. We sit here, guardians of these Indians, upon the theory that they are not qualified to administer their own affairs, and that if apportioned their own money they would part with it improvidently. Yet we are taking from them $14,000 a day without competition and without compensation.

Oil wells as a rule are capitalized at something like $500 per barrel per daily production. I do not know whether that theory be correct or not; I am not expert enough to know; but upon that theory the oil wells involved under the pending resolution would aggregate in value $5,000,000, which, according to the Secretary of the Interior, are to be turned over to these oil companies without compensation and without competition.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma makes some reference to the fact that Mr. Barnsdall is a debtor of the Standard Oil Co. The merits of this question can not possibly turn upon that point. It is true, however. If Senators will look on page 19 they will find where it is stated in Mr. Barnsdall's brief that in the year 1906 he borrowed from the Standard Oil Co. $7,500,000. The loan was readjusted in December, 1913, for some $6,800,000. Mr. Barnsdall claims that he is in the clutches of the Standard Oil Co. I do not know what his relations are nor do I particularly care. Whether he be a victim in the toils of this company or not can not possibly warrant the Senate of the United States in voting him millions of dollars worth of Osage property without competition or compensation.

It is true that the relationship between his company and the Standard Oil Co. is intimate, perhaps a necessity arising out of the relations of debtor and creditor. But I doubt if the Standard Oil Co. would lend $7,500,000 to an enemy or a rival. On page 69 you will see that of the five directors of the Barnsdall Co. three are appointed by the Standard Oil Co.

But that is not the worst, so far as the matter of policy is concerned. The Standard Oil Co. takes the entire production of Mr. Barnsdall's 300,000 acres, or at least so much of it as is under mortgage to the Standard Oil Co. Mr. Barnsdall is not allowed to sell, or does not sell, to the independent refiners in that section, notwithstanding independent refiners are paying bonuses ranging from 25 cents to 55 cents per barrel. Mr. Barnsdall stands hitched. He has to stand hitched. He sells his oil to the Standard Oil Co. for $1.40 per barrel, and the Standard fixes the price.

Now, if we renew these leases to Mr. Barnsdall, they have a corner on that vast daily production at a price of from 25 cents to 55 cents a barrel less than their independent competitors. As a mere policy, one would think that if this land could, without injustice, be thrown open to purchase by independent operators or independent producers it might possibly have some effect on the price of gasoline. I mention that as an incident.

One L. W. Young is vice president of the Barnsdall Oil Co.—page 24. He is its general manager and is the representative of the Standard Oil Co. On page 24 it is stated that Mr. Young developes the property. It seems that he assumes supreme, if not exclusive, control over these vast hundreds of thousands of acres.

The Gypsy Oil Co., under the ownership, I believe, of the Mellens, of Pittsburgh, is a subsidiary of the Gulf Pipe Line Co. I do not know the connection of the others.

Mr. President, let me say that I keenly appreciate the sentiment which has developed here in behalf of Mr. Barnsdall as a debtor of the Standard Oil Co. I appreciate his honesty and his endeavor to pay his indebtedness to that concern. No one would cancel a debt justly due to the Standard Oil Co. My only contention is that, anxious as I am for him to pay his debts, anxious as I am for the Standard to collect its debts, I am not willing for the Osage Tribe of Indians to pay the debt. That is the only point involved. The only point for the Senate to decide is whether Mr. Barnsdall should pay his own debt to the Standard Oil Co., or whether we will oblige the Osage Tribe of Indians to make that payment, without competition and compensation. That is the point involved.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GORE. I do; yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask a question entirely for the purpose of getting information. I have no other way of getting it than by listening to this debate, and I am very much interested in it. I should like to ask the Senator what would happen to these various oil wells in case the resolution should be defeated and Congress should take no action?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, an arrangement to cover the matter has been made by the Secretary of the Interior and agreed to by the Osage Indians and 153 lessees. The only one originally protesting was Mr. Barnsdall, though I believe some four others have joined in the protest since they, perhaps, caught a glimpse of the opportunity to get this splendid property without compensation and without competition. The Secretary has arranged to lease it in 4,800-acre tracts to 153 lessees, excepting Mr. Barnsdall, who received 28,040 acres. There are 16,000 acres, as suggested by my colleague, to be sold on the 16th of this month which would have been sold on the 15th of February but for this resolution. The sale has now been postponed, as I understand, to the 20th of April. These lands are to be leased to the highest bidder. I have no doubt that if Senators will watch the returns they will find that the lands will bring anywhere from four to five million of dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Is this a sale outright or a lease? Does it convey the title?

Mr. GORE. This is the plan: The oil rights or interests are to be sold upon a fixed royalty of a fifth or a sixth, dependent upon an arbitrary line of classification. Then the competition is as to the bonus. Whoever the purchaser may be, he is required to pay a fixed royalty—one-fifth in some cases, one-sixth in other cases. The competition is as to the bonus, and a given piece of property is awarded to the man offering the highest bonus.

Mr. NORRIS. That was one of the points I wanted to have made clear, and that was one of the objects of my question.

Mr. GORE. Allow me to say that Mr. Barnsdall is permitted to bid on all his excess producing properties over and above the 28,040 acres awarded to him by the Secretary of the Interior and the Osage council.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has mentioned the fact that we were taking this property away from the Indians.

Mr. GORE. I wish to be understood as quoting the Secretary of the Interior upon that point.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator ought to give us information bearing directly on whether or not we are taking the land away from the Indians and as to how much they would probably be able to get out of it if some other arrangement were made and this resolution were not passed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course that is a mere approximation. The estimates vary from $4,000,000 to $7,000,000 as to the amount that the Indians would receive. If the plan of the Secretary of the Interior is pursued and these lands are sold at auction on the 20th day of April next, it is estimated that they will realize to the Osage Indians an amount ranging from $4,000,000 to $7,000,000. I may say that I have made a request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to supply this information, and I had hoped to get it by 11 o'clock this morning. I have introduced a resolution this morning calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for such an estimate.

Mr. NORRIS. That includes an estimate of these bonuses, as I understand?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. In addition to that the Indians would get the same royalty that they would get if the resolution were passed?

Mr. GORE. There might be a little difference, varying with the arbitrary line, as to 25 barrels or a hundred barrels average production.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to make a statement at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I will try to make that proposition plain.

The proposition of the Secretary of the Interior, as I understand it, is this: First, no person shall be permitted to have a lease, unless he shall agree to pay either one-fifth or one-sixth of the oil production; there being an arbitrary line between the one-fifth and the one-sixth rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. One moment. All people desiring to bid must first agree to pay that proportion of the production specified by the Secretary of the Interior—in some cases it will be one-fifth, in some cases it will be one-sixth—but all bidders must pay the same, so far as the payment of a percentage of production is concerned. Then, that being settled, all men must bid against each other, to see which one will get the lease, and the one offering the largest sum of money for a lease embodying the terms I have just specified, will be awarded the lease. So there will be paid to the Indians such sum of money as is bid as a bonus upon the leases.

Mr. GORE. And, Mr. President, under the terms of this resolution, if it passes and is respected by the Secretary of the Interior, this four or five million dollars' worth of property will pass into the hands of Mr. Barnsdall, the Gypsy Oil Co., and one or two other concerns.

It may be said that is not final; but I ask Senators to look at line 4, on page 1, and it will be found that this resolution declares that this property shall be turned over to these described lessees for a period of two years; but, Senators, it does not stop there. It adds this significant phrase, "Or until further action by Congress." What does that mean? Why, that a mere Senate resolution shall divest the Osage Tribe of Indians of four million or five million dollars' worth of property, without competition or compensation, and transfer that property to these oil companies, until the Osages can secure the passage of a measure through the Senate, the passage of a measure through the House of Representatives, and its approval by the President to reverse action in adopting the pending resolution.

The resolution, as offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, provided that the proceeds should be turned over to a Federal trustee, pending some decision of these alleged equities; but the pending resolution omits that provision, it omits that protection to the Indians, and turns over four-fifths of this oil to Mr. Barnsdall and the Gypsy Oil Co., and not to a Federal trustee. It turns it over to them forever and a day, in order, forsooth, that Mr. Barnsdall may liquidate his obligations to the Standard Oil Co. Whether the Gypsy was so necessitous a creditor or not, I can not say.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma pardon me for an interruption?

Mr. GORE. I will, certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think, in justice to those who have had to do with this resolution, I should state to the Senate how it came that the provision in the original resolution for turning over the proceeds of oil lands in excess of the rental was stricken out.

When I came to look at that matter, it was very evident that there was no indication of any claim, nor probably could there ever have been any claim against Mr. Barnsdall for the proceeds of the oil in excess of the rent. It was a mere sort of—well, it did not rise to an intimation—it was a sort of false suggestion that somehow the proceeds of the oil in excess of the rent should be held by the Government pending the final disposition of these leases. It meant nothing whatever; and it occurred to me that it would be infinitely better that there should be no suggestion of that kind, which meant nothing.

I insisted that while I was against the resolution, yet if it was intended that any of the proceeds after rental was paid should be finally held out of the proceeds, it should plainly say so; if that was not the intention, and it was generally stated that the latter was the case, then no deceptive suggestion should be held out. That resolution provided for the payment of the rental, which was all that could have been taken from Mr. Barnsdall. It was on my suggestion—because I did not believe the resolution should contain a seductive suggestion that meant nothing—that the provision in regard to the proceeds of the oil in excess of the rental should be temporarily held by the Government was stricken out.

I say this without suggesting any final view of the matter now pending in the Senate. I felt it was due to others, upon whom the suggestion might fall that they had taken it out, that I should make this statement. I asked to take it out because I did not believe that there should be anything in a measure that appeared seductive and yet, in the last analysis, meant nothing.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the statement of the eminent Senator illustrates the difficulties and dangers of the Senate sitting here and passing in post haste upon such serious and far-reaching—I will not say legislation—but upon a mere Senate resolution intended to have the effect of legislation and of a judicial decree until reversed by Congress.

The Senator was entirely in error. The one thing that he thought was involved in it is the only thing that was not involved. The Indians would have gotten the rental anyway. Certainly nobody would challenge their right to have the rentals paid over if Mr. Barnsdall continued to hold the property. Nobody will suggest that the Osage Indians ought not to receive the rental or royalty. It related to the other five-sixths, and after the 16th of this month to the other sixth, for after the 16th day of this month six-sixths of this oil belongs to the Osage Tribe of Indians under their contract with Mr. Barnsdall. The question is, Shall he live up to his contract, shall the property go to him after it ought to revert to the Indians, or shall it be held by the Indians in accordance with the plan of the Secretary of the Interior and the obligation of this great Government to its Indian wards?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, my object in rising a few moments ago was rather to relieve anyone else from whatever imputation there might be in the suggestion of striking out the provision. I still think the Senator is mistaken. I asked many members of the committee whether it was intended that there should ever anything go to the Indians under the renewal or the continuation of the Barnsdall lease except the rent, and the universal answer was "no."

Mr. GORE. Certainly not.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I asked why hold out here a seductive suggestion that there was something to go to them? I was interested in relieving anyone else from any imputation on account of having taken the provision out.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course, if the Barnsdall leases are renewed or continued under this resolution, the one-sixth rental is all that will go to the Indians. The five-sixths that ought to go to them after March 16 would continue to go to Mr. Barnsdall if the resolution is adopted and respected; but if the resolution is not adopted the five-sixths, as well as the one-sixth royalty, will all inure to the benefit of the Osage Tribe of Indians.

Mr. President, it is suggested here that Mr. Barnsdall has equities in this property. Is not Mr. Barnsdall a successful business man? Is he not able to employ the highest legal talent? Does he not know whether or not a lease provides for its own renewal? Does he require a guardian at the hands of the Senate?

Mr. Barnsdall suggests that Mr. Young, the representative of the Standard Oil Co., called on Secretary Lane, and that the Secretary said that they would be treated fairly. Secretary Lane says, on page 22, that they have no legal right to a renewal of this lease. That is the point on which it turns; that is the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior; but, Mr. President, I should be willing, in order to save the lives of the Osages or their property, in order to prevent it from being taken away from them without competition and without compensation, to give Mr. Barnsdall an opportunity to have his day in court and have his equities, if any, adjudicated by the courts of the land. Why not put the proceeds of this oil in the hands of a Federal trustee and provide that Mr. Barnsdall shall have his day in court; and if he can establish any equities to the Osage oil, let him win a judgment for the proceeds and pay his debts? But, in Heaven's name, Senators, let us not usurp the functions of the judiciary and adjudicate these cases against our wards in favor of Mr. Barnsdall and the Gypsy Oil Co. without evidence, without argument, without competition, and without compensation.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator how much was invested by Mr. Barnsdall in his project there?

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator will find that on page 19 of the hearings. It was something like $10,000,000 prior to January 1, 1915, resulting in dividends of something in excess of $2,700,000. That was up to January 1, 1915, and I have searched the hearings in vain to discover the net and the gross earnings of the Barnsdall Oil Co. from January 1, 1915, down to the present day. I mention that because the last 10 months have been the most golden period in the history of the oil industry in this country. I do not know what his gross earnings or his net earnings have been since January 1, 1915. It is asserted by my colleague that during the last two years he has invested $2,000,000, and that forsooth he ought to have this property continued in his possession, although he has no contract to that effect.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Had Mr. Barnsdall been made to believe or been given to understand in any way that these leases would be renewed?

Mr. GORE. He says that Mr. Young, the representative of the Standard Oil Co., talked it over with Secretary Lane, and the Secretary said that they would be treated fairly; but I think Mr. Barnsdall says that they had no positive assurance to that effect. The Secretary says they had no right to expect a renewal and that they must have invested the $2,000,000, with full knowledge of the fact that their contract came to a full termination on March 16 of this year. Mark the exact words of the Secretary, on page 22:

> They knew that their leases would expire on March 16, 1916, and it must be assumed that the investments were made with full knowledge of the possibility of not being able to obtain renewals or new leases.

Mr. KENYON. One question more, Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator further. If this resolution is not passed, Mr. Barnsdall, now being indebted to the Standard Oil Co. to the extent of about $3,000,000, as I understand——

Mr. GORE. I do not remember the exact amount.

Mr. KENYON. Would lose that amount. That would be his loss from the transaction?

Mr. GORE. Oh, not at all. If you can say a man loses a thing that is not his, it would be a great deal more than that. His argument is—and it is a very pathetic one—that if he is not allowed to get this Osage oil land without competition and without compensation he will not be able to pay the Standard Oil Co., and that it will possibly result in his bankruptcy. I know that is an overpowering argument and touches the heart of any man of sensibilities.

Mr. KENYON. Is he able to pay this $3,000,000 at the present time?

Mr. GORE. He says he is not unless he can get this oil out of the Osage Tribe. It seems to turn on that.

Mr. REED. It is the novation of a debt.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks to interrupt the Senator from Oklahoma. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator has repeated several times the statement that this oil would be given to the Barnsdall Oil Co. without competition and without compensation.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I quote the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PAGE. Is that statement correct, under the resolution we now have before us?

Mr. GORE. It certainly is—that is, as to five-sixths in the case of one class of oil and as to four-fifths in the case of the other.

Mr. PAGE. That would be true if that were the limit; but, as I understand this resolution, the Secretary of the Interior has very much to say about the matter, and the resolution simply provides that the royalty shall not be less than one-sixth or one-fifth, as the case may be.

Mr. GORE. It does say that, Mr. President; but all the rest over and above one-sixth or one-fifth is a pure gift. The Indians have a right, after the 16th of this month, not only to the one-fifth and the one-sixth but they have a right to five-fifths of it; they have a right to six-sixths of it. They have a right to all that flows out of the ground, because Mr. Barnsdall has no contract, he has no legal right, he has no equity in this oil land, leases, or production after the 16th day of March, 1916.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator says Mr. Barnsdall has no equity after March 16.

Mr. GORE. I mean an equity that he could enforce in the courts. I do not know what definition the Senator attaches to "equity" other than that.

Mr. PAGE. The Committee on Indian Affairs probably continued their investigation of this matter for two or three weeks, and at the end of that investigation I doubt if there was one Senator on the committee who did not believe that there were equities there in favor of Mr. Barnsdall. Of course, it is true that the contract expires on the 16th day of March, and that there is no legal right beyond that time; but I think the committee were of the opinion that Mr. Barnsdall had some equities there.

Mr. GORE. The vote was not unanimous in the committee, I may say.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont one question. If that was the conviction of the committee, why did not the committee report a resolution affording Mr. Barnsdall an opportunity and a day in court to have his equities ascertained and adjudicated? I am willing to do that now. Notwithstanding this is the best time that there ever has been, or perhaps that there ever will be, for the sale of these Indian lands at public auction—they will realize a larger price to-day than ever before, or possibly than hereafter—I do not want to divest anybody of any equities; and if that be insisted upon, I shall, at the possible jeopardy, for the time, of the Indians' rights and interests, let Mr. Barnsdall have his day in court; but I warrant you now the suit will never be filed.

Mr. PAGE. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question. I suppose he may have no legal right to any continuation of his leases. I do not know that I am absolutely correct in saying that the committee were unanimous in their opinion that he had some equities there; but certainly a large majority of the committee were of that opinion, and I doubt if very many words were uttered in the committee that did not indicate that the general feeling was that Mr. Barnsdall had an equity there of which he would be deprived. The object of this resolution was not to deprive the Indians of any of their rights, because it placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior the right to charge not less than one-fifth or not less than one-sixth, as the case may be; and when the Senator says that Mr. Barnsdall is to enter there without compensation, he makes a statement that I can not understand.

Mr. GORE. I am quoting the Secretary of the Interior, and I may say that I believe it is true, because suppose under this resolution he reserves to the Indians one-fifth and one-sixth, in the respective classes, and turns over to Barnsdall the four-fifths and the five-sixths, and which, as a matter of right, belongs to the Indians. Is not that depriving them of their property without compensation and without competition and without due process of law?

The Senator will not suggest that Mr. Barnsdall has any legal right, and he will not suggest that he has an equity that he could enforce in a court. If that is not taking their property without competition and without compensation, then it is a mere difference of opinion that of course there is no tribunal to adjudicate or to settle.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator a further question. He speaks of this one-fifth or one-sixth royalty. Suppose that to do equity to all parties the Secretary of the Interior should demand of him five-sixths of all the oil, would the Senator then say it was without compensation?

Mr. GORE. If six-sixths belongs to the Indians, I most assuredly would. That is the only point involved. I shall not protest against a resolution to allow Mr. Barnsdall to have that matter adjudicated in a court. That is all I can consent to do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What request does the Senator from Missouri desire to submit?

Mr. REED. I desire, with the permission of the Senator from Oklahoma, to ask the Senator from Vermont what he means by equities in Mr. Barnsdall. To make my question a little plainer, does the Senator mean that Mr. Barnsdall has some legal right which has not been absolutely and fully protected, or does he merely mean that Mr. Barnsdall has gone there, made some investments, and make a written contract, and has not been quite successful enough to make money on his contract, and therefore he has a right to hold the property until he does make money?

Mr. PAGE. I shall be glad to answer the Senator. I understand that it is the custom, with reference to all those oil leases, that the party who develops the well has what is called an equity, to this extent—that if he wants to continue these leases and pay what others pay he has a preferential right under the general custom and practice of oil leasing in Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Where it is written in the lease.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that there is any law to that effect?

Mr. PAGE. No, sir.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that in the ordinary lease that reservation is made if it is expected to be exercised?

Mr. PAGE. I do not know that I can answer the question of the Senator. I do know that in all the testimony before the committee it was apparently confessed that the man who developed the wells there was entitled to a preferential right, or at least was generally accorded the right of a re-lease, provided he paid a satisfactory price.

Mr. GORE. There is no question about that if it is written in the lease. It is the practice in the Creek and Cherokee oil countries to grant a lease for a fixed period of years, or so long as oil and gas is found in paying quantities.

Mr. REED. If it is written in the lease?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, would the Senator hold to this doctrine—that if a man comes down and asks for a lease to dig an oil well, and they solemnly write down that the lease shall expire in five years, the five years does not mean anything in that lease, but that it really means forever? Is there any such law as that anywhere on earth?

Mr. PAGE. I understand that the practice is to allow that man who is the progressive man in digging those wells to have a preference in re-leasing, if he will pay what others pay.

Mr. REED. That is just simply a custom to which some people conform and some do not, is it not?

Mr. PAGE. I think it is the general custom, if I may be allowed.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator prepared to say, or is anybody else prepared to say, that that is a custom that has grown to such an extent as to become a law?

Mr. GORE. That is sometimes written in the leases.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that this discussion is proceeding rather informally; but as it consists largely of the discussion of questions of fact, the Chair has not felt called upon to interfere with it. So the Senators may proceed, according to their judgment, until such time as the Chair thinks the rules are being violated. The Senator from Missouri need not desist because of this announcement of the Chair, however.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this resolution—which, as I say, is merely an act of the Senate, but which has such far-reaching consequences, entailing such serious injury upon the Indians, and conferring such a splendid boon on Mr. Barnsdall and his fellow beneficiaries, not an act of the Congress, not a joint resolution, not even a concurrent resolution, as proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] in the first instance—contains a bit of humor. These vast properties are to be transferred without any judicial proceeding, and are to be transferred indefinitely until otherwise ordered by Congress, until Congress shall pass a law which shall be approved by the President to reverse this situation. Notwithstanding that, there is a bit of grim humor in the pending resolution. It provides that after that shall be done an investigation shall be held by the Committee on Indian Affairs. How long will that last? How long will it be until Congress will take action upon that report? And until Congress does take action reversing the action proposed here to-day, these magnificent properties will be turned over to Mr. Barnsdall and to the Gypsy Oil Co. aggregating several millions of dollars; but if not turned over to them permanently, at least while they hold them, yielding some 10,000 barrels of oil a day for the present, with the possibility of an increase or decrease of production. And this, Mr. President, is to be inflicted on the wards of this great Government after two hours' consideration at the hands of the United States Senate!

Therefore, Mr. President, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I hope the motion to lay on the table will not prevail, as I should like to have a few minutes, at least, in which to answer my colleague.

Mr. GORE. Then I withhold the motion.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the force of the proposed resolution. It is nothing more than a statement of opinion by the Senate that there is some right involved, which may be persuasive with the Secretary of the Interior, if not the Osages. I call your attention to the fact that under the request of this resolution the Secretary can put the royalty at any figure he sees fit, provided it shall not be any less than a sixth, or less than a fifth where the production is as high as 25 barrels per day, but he can put it as much higher as he pleases. He can take whatever of value there is entirely away from these producers if he sees fit under this resolution. It leaves it with the Secretary to say what would be just and right, the premises considered.

The improvident statement of my colleague that it is "taking away" five millions, ten millions, or more of property from the poor Osages—who are the richest people per capita on earth—to "give" it to Barnsdall, the partner of the wicked Standard Oil, and to give it to the Gypsy Oil Co., has no foundation in fact. It "takes away" nothing and it "gives" nothing. This resolution simply requests the Secretary of the Interior to deal with this matter so as to recognize temporarily the preference right of those who produced these wells on terms equal to what others could afford, but at not less than a sixth and not less than a fifth, and only until the committee can investigate and report to Congress. Senate resolution No. 107 is merely a request based on the evidence, not an act of Congress. These men will derive no benefit whatever from this resolution unless the Secretary of the Interior, persuaded thereby, makes an arrangement to recognize the ethical and moral right of men who drilled these wells in the belief that they would be permitted to have the preferential right of renewal on equal terms that is the universal custom in all oil fields, regardless of written contracts.

My colleague quotes the Secretary of the Interior as stating that—

> The apparent purpose of this resolution is that the Barnsdall Oil Co. may secure valuable property belonging to the Osage Tribe in excess of the acreage permitted under the tribal resolution and the regulations of this department without competition and without compensation.

The criticism of the Secretary was addressed to Senate resolution 4 and not to the resolution reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, Senate resolution 107, and has no just application to the latter, which does not propose using Osage property without compensation, but deliberately leaves the compensation to be fixed by the Secretary and the Osages, who must make the lease.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MYERS. I observe, first, that this resolution is not a joint resolution nor a concurrent resolution.

Mr. OWEN. No.

Mr. MYERS. It is simply a resolution of the Senate—of this body.

Mr. OWEN. That is all.

Mr. MYERS. I observe that it says in the first few lines:

> Resolved, That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to refrain—

From doing certain things.

Mr. OWEN. That is all it does; it simply makes a request.

Mr. MYERS. I know the Senator has given the subject a great deal more attention than I have and is more familiar with legislative procedure and its force and effect. I desire to ask him if that request will be in any wise binding upon the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely not; it is merely a persuasive suggestion.

Mr. MYERS. Or whether he will be at liberty to disregard it altogether?

Mr. OWEN. He would be at liberty to disregard it. It is merely the action of the Indian Affairs Committee, confirmed by the Senate after the Senate has heard the facts in regard to it, and the Secretary could disregard that if he chose. I assume, however, that he would respect the opinion of the Senate to the extent of recognizing so much of the moral right as he might, upon further consideration, think these persons had, and if a few Senators, misled by the Osage lobby, prevent by a filibuster a vote in the Senate, I assume the Secretary will take it as confessed that the Senate would have passed the resolution except for the pitiful filibuster and that he will show respect for the known wishes of the Senate and of a majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

This resolution can not "take away" property from the Osages. It does not propose to do that; and the enlargement upon and undue emphasis placed on the idea that it is giving away Osage property "without compensation and without competition" has no justification. The "compensation" on which their preferential rights are based has already been partly paid by these men, who have spent millions of dollars within the last few years to develop these values—millions they would not have invested in drilling these wells in 1913 and 1915 except on the fixed belief their right to renew was assured. These values were created by them with their capital and their industry and their activity and their initiative, and the increased royalty contemplated by the resolution completes the full measure of compensation.

These values should not be regarded in the highest moral and ethical sense as absolutely those of the mere legal owner of the lands whose values have been created by these faithful tenants. We are dealing here between those whom we represent on both sides, our Osages and our white producers. We represent the citizens of the United States who are entitled to consideration there; I mean, those producers who are entitled to consideration because their courage, industry, and capital produced the value while the Osages slept; and the only consideration extended here is to request the Secretary of the Interior to recognize their preference rights at such figure as he thinks just to fix, and to allow them to continue, but at not less than one-sixth and not less than one-fifth for a limited period.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was not present in the Senate Chamber when the Senator made his first statement in this discussion; but I desire to ask the Senator if the Secretary of the Interior, independently of any action that may be taken by the Senate, has the power or the right, under the law, to do the thing that he is asking the Senate to request the Secretary of the Interior to do now?

Mr. OWEN. I think he has.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is not this merely a petition or a request from the Senate addressed to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. OWEN. I think the Secretary has the power, in the exercise of his authority as Secretary of the Interior, to approve Osage leases, and to remove the Osage Council and all the power needed to manage this matter. That is my opinion with regard to it; and I think the reason why the ethical and moral claims of these people have not been adequately protected is simply because the Osages demanded that no moral right of any man should be recognized there, and the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, after talking the matter over with them, finally persuaded them that they ought to recognize all of these lessees in the renewal right, excepting those who had wells producing in excess of 25 barrels a day, and Barnsdall and one or two others who had leases in excess of 4,800 acres. There were those two classes, and they drew an arbitrary line in order to satisfy the demand of the Osages, and became committed to this policy and bound to sustain it before Congress.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think it is only fair to the Senator to say that I was one of the members of the subcommittee appointed to hear the testimony taken in this matter and I heard, I think, every word of it. I believe it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Bureau do not have the necessary information or have such information as they should have in order to make the leases for an indefinite time or in perpetuity. I think I may be permitted to say that, so far as the subcommittee is concerned, we thought it would be better for the Indians to delay making these contracts in perpetuity, and it was for that reason that resolution was drawn suggesting to the Secretary of the Interior that no leases should be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. OWEN. I will move to lay the Senate bill 1417 temporarily aside, or I yield to the Senator from Virginia to make the motion, if he will.

Mr. SWANSON. If the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, it would not affect the vote on the 21st of March.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That opens up a brand-new question, in view of the character of the unanimous-consent agreement. The Chair is not now prepared to rule upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At least this would be true, would it not? If by motion the unfinished business is laid aside, by motion it could be taken up again before the end of the day, and that would restore it to its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not so sure about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we can not handle it in that way, we are absolutely tied up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is one of the embarrassments involved in the controversy.

Mr. GALLINGER. I venture to suggest if it is done in the way the Senator from Georgia mentioned, the unanimous-consent agreement is abrogated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of that impression, but for the present the Senator from Oklahoma may continue his remarks on the pending question.

Mr. OWEN. Then I yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been much disposed to be very liberal about the matter of allowing interruptions, thinking there might be a vote taken on the pending resolution before 2 o'clock. Now that the matter is at large and is likely to run for some time, the Chair will now notify the Senate that if a Senator yields for interruption other than an actual question which is intended to elicit information about a matter of fact, that such interruption will be charged against him as a partial or complete exhaustion of his right to speak during the day on the pending question.

Mr. OWEN. Then I will ask the Senator from North Dakota to pardon me for a moment. I will conclude in just a few minutes, because I do not wish to detain the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will be afforded ample opportunity to address the Senate in his own right.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. REED. Is the resolution now in such a condition that it can under any circumstances be voted on unless the pending buiness is laid aside?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. REED. If I understood the suggestion of the President, if the unfinished business is laid aside it is displaced permanently?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not unless a motion is made and adopted to so displace it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At least a motion of this kind could be made. We could lay it aside for a certain length of time. We could definitely lay it aside until Monday morning, and that would preserve its rights.

Mr. GORE. Then it would lose its character as the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it would not lose its character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor. We will cross that bridge when we get to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to ask a question—not for debate.

Mr. OWEN. I hope the Senator will not ask me to yield the floor if it will have that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would not take snap judgment on a Senator where a question is addressed to him which is anywhere near the border line of doubt. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. CUMMINS. These lands belong to the Osage Indians. What do the Indians want with regard to the matter? I ask purely for information. I assume they act through their council. It is composed of intelligent men, I assume. What do they want to do with regard to these leases?

Mr. OWEN. They want to have them terminate on the 16th of March, 1916, as to the 16,740 acres above described, and the leases immediately sold and the money divided per capita.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, the Indians want the leases to terminate?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; they want to sell the property to new lessees, without recognizing the right of those who drilled the wells to a new lease on equal terms with others.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the resolution proposes is to deny to the Indians the thing that they want to do about their own land?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator may put it that way, if he likes. What actually we propose in the resolution is that the moral right of a renewal lease to the persons who have produced the value in these lands shall be recognized upon such terms as the Secretary may see fit, not less than one-sixth and not less than one-fifth royalty, until investigation can be made into the facts and a full report made.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more question. Has the Secretary of the Interior any authority in the law to act upon the matter save upon the initiative of the Indians?

Mr. OWEN. No; the Osages must make the lease. The Osage Council, under the law, must make the lease, but the Secretary dictates the forms of the leases, conducts all the business, and must approve all leases, and has all the power necessary to obtain justice. He can remove from office the entire Osage Council.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where do we get authority to pass a resolution of this sort?

Mr. OWEN. The authority of the Senate to request what it deems just can not be denied. This is only a request on the Secretary of the Interior. He has to approve all leases. So his approval is a matter of great importance. The Osage Council makes the lease, and the Secretary approves the lease after it is made. The Osages, of course, want to get every dollar they can by selling everything there, and they proposed to disregard the equities of all the producers, covering 250,000 acres; but they finally agreed with the Secretary to recognize the equities of all of them except of those who had developed certain 16,740 acres; 15,000 acres of which were oil-producing wells, but are outside of the 4,800-acre rule, held by lessees who could not, under the 4,800-acre-rule, retain those 15,000 acres of developed land, and 1,740 acres which exceeds 25 barrels per day per unit, thus making a total of 16,740 acres held by developing producers who were thus discriminated against, some because they had over 25-barrel wells and some because they had more than 4,800 acres.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I examined the hearing with some care, and my difficulty was to find any authority on the part of the Secretary of the Interior to do the thing that is requested in the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. The council itself must take the initiative. They must make the contract; they must make the lease. The Secretary of the Interior must approve it. They agreed on June 17 last as to all these lands except 15,000 acres of surplus and 1,740 acres of 25-barrel land. The renewal leases on the latter lands were refused by the Osage Council. These lands, under the universally accepted rule, should be leased to the producers who drilled the producing wells on these lands, but their rights were disregarded by the resolution of June 17, which was passed without giving those men any opportunity whatever to be heard by the Osage Council. They were not permitted to be heard by the council, and they had no opportunity to be heard while the council was framing the resolutions. They, of course, are dissatisfied. They thought they had a moral right that ought to be recognized.

The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs having approved the resolution of June 17, in fact, having in a certain narrow sense, I think, been responsible for its adoption, because it was the best arrangement they could make with the Osages, now feel bound to sustain the Osages in what was deemed a settlement. The department officials did the best they could, and I do not wish to be understood as criticizing them about it at all. I think, on the contrary, they are entitled to be praised for what they were able to do. But under the pressure of the Osages demanding the "pound of flesh" it was as good an arrangement as they could make, and the compact was written in the resolution of the Osage Council of June 17.

It was highly advantageous to lessees who had developed nothing. It was thought very injurious by Barnsdall, because it took from him 300,000 acres on which he had paid a dollar an acre per annum, and took from him about 15,000 acres of land he had actually developed and on which he had expended about $2,000,000 at the near close of the lease.

It was satisfactory to everybody except those who were discriminated against.

The persons whose rights were ignored by that resolution naturally felt that the Senate was the only place they could come to, and they came to the Senate of the United States with a prayer in the form of Senate resolution No. 4. They came before the Senate, and the Senate referred the matter for consideration to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Committee on Indian Affairs considered it for weeks. They heard a large number of people for and against it, including the Osages, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and they finally concluded that the best thing that could be done would be to request the Secretary to withhold making oil leases on the Osage land, in controversy until the Senate committee could examine into the matter, and meantime let these people who had developed the 16,740 of leases offered for sale conduct these operations at not less than one-sixth and at not less than one-fifth on the 25-barrel well, but as much more as he saw fit, to thus take care of whatever equity and right the Osages had until the matter could be investigated, which I would assume could be done and reported on next December. The resolution confirms the Secretary's action as to 235,000 acres, requests him to make no leases on but to permit certain lessees to operate 16,740 acres temporarily and on such terms as he may impose.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question.

Mr. OWEN. If I do not lose my right, I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma how long the original lease of the lessees in question was in force?

Mr. OWEN. For 10 years, up to March 16, 1916.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the Senator if it would not be fair and advisable to amend the resolution, in line 4, page 1, by changing "two years" to "one year"?

Mr. OWEN. I think that would be all right.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the Senator if one year would not be ample time for Congress to make the investigation?

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that I preferred one year. Some other Senators desired two years. I thought one year sufficient, but I had no objection to two years, because the matter was inconsequential.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. If I can yield without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator to yield for a question. Is it not true that this resolution leaves the Secretary of the Interior and the council of the Osage Indian Nation and these lessees and sublessees perfectly free to make whatever bargain they think best for the Indians, provided only that there shall be a royalty of not less than one-sixth in one case and one-fifth in the other?

Mr. OWEN. In answer to the Senator's question, I will say that this resolution leaves the matter open in that precise manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the avowed purpose of it?

Mr. OWEN. That is the real purpose of it. It is to let the Osages and the Interior Department and the people who feel that they have been very cruelly treated come together and make some kind of an adjustment of it.

My colleague lays great stress on Barnsdall's borrowing money from the Standard Oil Co. and would apparently leave the impression Barnsdall was the Standard Oil Co. The evidence before the committee was overwhelming and uncontroverted that the Standard Oil was merely a pledge of Barnsdall's securities. If Barnswall is bankrupted by the refusal of his just rights, the Standard Oil Co. will be able to take all his securities at sacrifice prices and profit by his financial ruin.

If his leases in Osage now offered for sale are sold to the highest bidder, we are informed Barnsdall can not buy them, but the Standard Oil Co., with a treasury full of cash, can buy them and profit by the defeat of this resolution.

If the properties are sold for cash, the very few who have the cash to buy will only do so on the cheapest cash basis and the Osages will suffer a corresponding loss.

My colleague rejoices in ringing the changes over and over on the words "without competition and without compensation," used by the Secretary as to another resolution and not used by the Secretary and not justly applicable to the pending resolution—Senate resolution 107—which contemplates just compensation fixed at a figure based on a fair estimate of what a fair competitor could pay.

My colleague insists that six-sixths of the oil and five-fifths of the oil belongs to the Osage and whoever gets any of it will, in effect, be taking Osage property without compensation.

Many operators believe one-sixth royalty is worth more than five-sixths to the operator who must operate the small wells, clean them, run the power plant, the pumps, draw the casing, the rods, and pay for the innumerable items required in keeping a well alive and productive. It requires expert knowledge as well as capital, and if the oil men should withdraw their trained, organized corps of experts, remove their power plants, and pumps and utensils and apparatus the "five-fifths" and the "six-sixths" would soon be ruined with water and débris and the entire field made comparatively worthless.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the junior Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator in this connection if they have not the right to do that without the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. No; I do not think they have, because the resolution of June 17 precludes the Osages from taking any further action unless they reconsider it, and the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs feel obliged to defend the June 17 resolution, because they were committed as in a bargain.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator maintain that this resolution has any binding effect or the force of a law?

Mr. OWEN. No; certainly not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then how does it give the Secretary of the Interior or the council of the Osages any authority to act in the matter at all?

Mr. OWEN. The Secretary of the Interior has got to approve or not approve a lease, and the Osage council has a right by statute to make these leases, and in the light of this discussion it is assumed that both the Osages and the Interior Department will be persuaded to reach some kind of an adjustment of the matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This is merely persuasive?

Mr. OWEN. That is all.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It does not give them any authority they have not already?

Mr. OWEN. No; it does not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Or withhold any?

Mr. OWEN. It requests the Secretary not to make leases on contested Osage lands until a congressional investigation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OWEN. If I may do so without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. REED. If I may not trench on the rule, the Senator has repeatedly stated, as I understood him, that if the resolution is passed it leaves the Secretary of the Interior perfectly free to make a lease as advantageous as he can for the benefit of the Osage people. I call his attention to this language in the resolution:

That, pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to refrain for a period of two years, or until further action by Congress, from making any disposition by lease or sale of such quarter-section units of the lands on the Osage Reservation in the State of Oklahoma as have been developed by oil operators—

And so forth.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, of course, we all understand that the resolution is not binding as a matter of law, but, in so far as it is binding, do not the words I have just read preclude the Secretary of the Interior from doing anything whatsoever except to allow the present leases to run?

Mr. OWEN. No; I think the effect of the resolution, if read in its entirety, is that it is a request not to lease the 16,740 acres proposed to be sold, but that such lands be left to be operated by the present oil operators, "who are now in possession of and operating the same at a royalty of not less than one-sixth." The Secretary would have to say what the royalty was above one-sixth and he would be within the meaning of the resolution to make the leases at such higher figure as he thought just. The resolution is merely a suggestion that these people have a moral right which ought to be considered.

The resolution does not request any delay on 235,000 acres the Osages have agreed to lease under their resolution of June 17, 1915.

I do not call it an equitable right, as the Senator could further enlarge on the question as to what is equitable. I think we may say that a legal right or an equitable right in the narrowest sense of the law books does not exist under the terms of the written Osage contract, which terminates March 16, 1916, but under the practice and under the universal practice of the oil fields I think it does establish a moral and an ethical right that ought to be recognized and enforced by a Government that has the highest sense of honor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask another question, if the Senator will pardon me. Are not these various leases standing upon different footings with different merits, some of the operators possessing wells with a given productive capacity, others with wells of another productive capacity?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And some without wells at all?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, does not the resolution leave the Secretary of the Interior free to make a bargain with each lessee?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely so, by acting through the Osages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And fit the royalty to the merits of the cases?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Instead of laying down an abstract rule of one-fifth where it may be one-third ought to be charged, or in another case it may be only one-tenth?

Mr. OWEN. That is the exact meaning of the resolution, except the minimum is fixed at one-sixth and one-fifth royalty. I want to say in regard to one of these companies, the Gipsy Oil Co., which has struck very rich fields there, that I should expect the Secretary to make some arrangement with them, so as to deal justly both by the Osages and by the company, to the extent that both have moral and ethical rights. I do not know what the conditions are in regard to that particular matter, except I do know that they have struck very valuable wells.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not true, in furtherance of that, that one of the lessees has told the committee and publicly announced that he would make an offer of one-fifth for all, whether under or above 25 barrels a day?

Mr. OWEN. The report was made by Barnsdall that he would give one-fifth of all the production he had on the condition that he might take 300,000 acres. That condition could not be acceded to by the committee. They believed that it was better to break this land up into smaller holdings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I read the testimony rather hastily.

Mr. OWEN. A man will sometimes have a thing understood but not express it in proper shape, and Barnsdall was at first misunderstood to agree to give 20 per cent on all wells without the condition he should retain 300,000 acres.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not hear all the colloquy between the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Oklahoma, and I think my question was probably answered during that conversation; but I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if the question propounded by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is not answered in the resolution, commencing in line 2, where it says:

Said developed lands thus withheld from lease after the expiration of the term of the existing oil lease may continue to be operated by the present oil operators who are now in possession of and operating the same at a royalty of not less than one-sixth on all leases of quarter-section units when the average production is less than 25 barrels per well per day and a royalty of not less than one-fifth on all such leases when the average production exceeds 25 barrels per well per day.

It would seem to me that that would answer the query of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. OWEN. I made that explanation to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana will state it.

Mr. MYERS. Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. The armor-plate bill is before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am really trying to get information about the resolution, because I have no opinion upon its merits; but in connection with the questions I have already asked the Senator from Oklahoma, I desire to ask another. The language of the resolution just quoted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, beginning in line 2, reads:

Said developed lands thus withheld from lease after the expiration of the term of the existing oil lease may continue to be operated by the present oil operators who are now in possession of and operating the same at a royalty.

Is it believed that the Senate of the United States, acting independently of the House and independently of the President, can give to the lessees by a resolution the right to continue in the possession of the property against the will of the Indians?

Mr. OWEN. The language should be shaped so as to express only the request of the Senate. I agree with the Senator that the language is defective and not well chosen.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not only not well chosen, it seems to me, but it is the assumption of authority or power upon our part that we all know we do not possess.

Mr. OWEN. That merely goes to put an interpretation upon words that are not apt or proper to convey the real meaning of the resolution, which was merely an expression of opinion. That was all that was intended; and at the proper time, if permitted to do so, I shall offer an amendment that will meet the point the Senator well makes. The error was due to an omission in part.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question, that I may get the matter straight in my own mind so as to vote intelligently upon it. The Osage Indians, or their representatives, are objecting to the passage of the resolution which is proposed?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What does the Senator estimate the adoption of the resolution and the carrying out of its purposes under its terms would cost the Osages?

Mr. OWEN. I do not think it would cost them anything.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the basis of their objection to it?

Mr. OWEN. Their objection is that they want to have these lands immediately put up and sold to the highest bidder and divide the money quickly, and the quicker the better.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think it would bring more money to them if sold in that way than they would receive ultimately?

Mr. OWEN. I think probably that in the meantime, until this report is made, the Secretary of the Interior would fix the royalty that is to be paid at not less than one-sixth or one-fifth—possibly much higher in certain cases—and thereafter the matter would be adjusted with entire justice to the Osages.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think that it is to the pecuniary interest of the Osage Indians that this matter should be sold now or later?

Mr. OWEN. I think the probabilities are that the price of oil as well as of gasoline is going up. That is what men generally think. If so, a sale a little later would probably bring more money than now, if that policy were found best.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It would mean money to them if the resolution is not passed and the Secretary of the Interior permitted to go on and carry out the plans which the resolution proposes to halt?

Mr. OWEN. I think no one can absolutely say how it will turn out; but in this case the resolution only proposes that, as to the royalty, not less than one-sixth and not less than one-fifth, it be left with the Secretary of the Interior to determine what the just and proper arrangement would be for the Osages and for the men who have drilled the wells until the Congress can act upon the matter when more fully advised, if it sees fit to act at all.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But it is the Senator's opinion, if the Osage Indians are permitted to enjoy their legal rights in this property and this proposition of yours should be defeated and the land sold, they would probably get more money for them than they would if the matter were postponed or your resolution were adopted?

Mr. OWEN. I can not foresee exactly what will happen. I do not know what the Secretary would do or what the Osages would do. I think they ought to adjust the difficulty. My opinion is that if the resolution should pass the Osages and the operators and the Secretary would come to some kind of an arrangement in regard to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does not the Senator think it is the duty of Congress as trustee in dealing with our wards to lead us to be just rather than generous to the gentlemen who are here demanding or asking for this privilege?

Mr. OWEN. I think we should be just, both to the whites and the reds, and it is on the basis of justice and not on any other basis that I favor this resolution, which was brought out of the Committee on Indian Affairs, not as my resolution but as the resolution of the Committee on Indian Affairs. This matter was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs and I am appearing simply on behalf of that committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am not imputing to the Senator any personal interest or anything of that kind.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no; of course, I know that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The question with me is what is best for the Indians. The Indian is entitled to the protection of his legal right, and Congress has no right to say that you are under a moral obligation to this oil company.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is of value to the Indians to recognize and to teach them to recognize the moral and the ethical rights of others, just as I think it is with regard to myself, to recognize the ethical rights of others as I always try to do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that the operators leased this property 10 years ago, and have had the use of it for all these years, and they have not been defeated in any way in the execution of the contract. Now, the contract has been lived up to by the Indians, and if there are any advantages to accrue that they are legally entitled to, it occurs to me it would be rather an immoral thing on the part of the Senate or the authorities at Washington to deny them whatever benefit may accrue to them.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will permit me, while it is true that the Indians received the royalty under the contract and lived up to the contract in the sense that they permitted these men to drill wells and labor for them and pay them royalties, and all that, there is another aspect that I want to emphasize, and that is that within two years before the lease terminated these men were induced to spend millions of dollars on the belief that they would have the customary preferential right of renewal which prevails throughout all the oil regions of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Who induced them? Who gave them that assurance?

Mr. OWEN. They were induced by the reasonable inference which they drew from repeated hearings in the Interior Department, from the letter from Supt. James A. Carroll, who represented the Interior Department in December, 1914, and because of the widespread custom, the universal custom, I may say, of giving the preferential right to renew his lease to a man who had developed oil in paying quantities, and from the policy of the department outside the Osage Nation, and from the policy of Congress in the acts of 1896 and 1906.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course, that is merely a matter of speculation; but I ask the Senator if the Indians were on the other side, does he think the men who are here suing for peace would have shown them any consideration, would have made any concession to them that would have been profitable to the Indians if it had been a losing investment to the lessee?

Mr. OWEN. I would say so far as a losing investment to the lessees is concerned, the Secretary reports that 141 of these lessees failed to get back their principal in the investment in the Osage country, and only 12 of them got back their principal with a profit.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator does not think that these Osage Indians ought to make good that loss?

Mr. OWEN. I have not made any such contention. These white operators bear their losses with dignity and in silence, losses they made in trying to get oil in the Osage country, of which the Osages would have been the beneficiaries.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the treatment the Indians usually have received at the hands of white men before.

Mr. OWEN. I have not made any such contention. I was only saying that I thought these people had a moral and ethical right, because they did invest several million dollars just before the lease expired, in the firm belief that they would be given a preferential right of renewal, which is the universal custom of the oil fields. It is unthinkable that they would have done this without a chance to be repaid, unless they had relied confidently on the justice of the Osages and the protection of this Government.

But my colleague and the Senator from Missouri suggest that a preference right to renew only exists when it is a legal contract written in the face of the original lease. The contrary is true. This right is universally recognized when it is not written in the original lease, and that is why these people confidently relied on the usual rule applying and which would have applied except for the Osages, who suddenly denied the right.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma allow me to make a suggestion at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. LANE. The Senator from Oklahoma says that these oil operators expended some money upon the assurance or on the inference drawn from certain statements made to them by a representative of the Government that they would receive recognition if they made such development, and he named the man who did it, who was Mr. Carroll, the superintendent of that tribe of Indians. At the time, or just before or just after, or about that time, Mr. Carroll was a partner with some of these oil operators in the operation and ownership of the oil wells, for which he offered them a reasonable assurance that their leases would be renewed when they came before the Interior Department. That is the sworn testimony of Mr. Carroll himself before the Indian Joint Commission which was appointed to investigate the affairs of those Indians. I was a member of that commission, and what I have stated is of record. It is in the hearings, and I can produce it at any time if anyone questions the statement.

Mr. Carroll was an owner of stock in an oil company which was being operated on the identical reservation of which he was superintendent. If that is where they got their assurance, they got it from their partner. That answers the question of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. I am sorry he has left the Chamber.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the circular letter of Superintendent Carroll, to which I referred, was written on December 11, and is as follows:

DEAR SIR: Schedules are being prepared to be used at the hearing as to the renewal of the so-called Foster lease before the honorable Secretary of the Interior in Washington in the immediate future. It is the desire of this office that each lessee be gievn full credit for all the development done upon the acreage charged to him up to December 31, 1914. To this end we suggest that a statement be mailed to this office at once—if no change will take place between now and December 31—showing the dry oil and gas and the gas wells in service commercially, if any, upon each separate lot or section or division thereof charged to you.

The renewal, if any, will be based upon the records as shown by this office.

The oil men say that they thought they were going to be given credit according to the industry and activity they showed as tenants upon this ground.

Mr. LANE. Who signed that letter?

Mr. OWEN. It is signed by James A. Carroll, superintendent in the Osage Nation. The comment of the Senator from Oregon that Carroll had had stock in some company I do not think precluded the oil men from believing that he intended by this letter to suggest to them that they would be given credit in renewing leases according to their activities as tenants in drilling wells. I am quite sure that it is possible to put that construction upon it, and they claimed that they did draw that inference from it.

The superintendent's letter was an official letter; it was a circular letter, and the little stock he had in one of 152 companies was no notice to these companies of any moral turpitude in the official circular. The circular letter was not disapproved by his superiors but was defended and its import questioned by them.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that Mr. Carroll was the superintendent, bound in sacred honor to protect the interests of the Government, as well as the Indians under him. While agent of the Government and the guardian of his unfortunate wards he entered into partnership with one of the large firms that is mentioned here by the purchase of oil stock, and participated in the profits. While superintendent of that Indian tribe the Indians paid 40 per cent per annum for money which they borrowed from one of his partners with which to pay their debts, which it is said was a more favorable rate than they could get from any other broker or money grabber in the town. One of the partners of the firm that lent this money was vice president of one bank in which the Government makes its deposits of the money of these Indians, and the other partner was the vice president of the opposition bank. An Indian could not borrow a cent at either one of those banks, but could go to the little brokerage establishment which was run by these gentlemen, and he could borrow money at 40 per cent per annum. It was the best he could get. When, perchance, a row was raised about it, this same superintendent deducted out the usury, and the Indian had to pay only the legal rate of interest.

Mr. OLIVER. I would ask the Senator——

Mr. LANE. Just one moment. The Indians in the meantime were receiving one-eighth royalty—12½ per cent for the use of their oil wells—while the intermediate agent was receiving one-sixth. Those are the facts.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator yield to me for a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has a right to make a parliamentary inquiry. He does not need to ask permission of the Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not clear as to the ruling of the Chair, if there was a ruling, when the question arose some time ago as to the effect of a motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 107, which undoubtedly would displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was during the morning hour; that was made before 2 o'clock. At 2 o'clock it was displaced by the unfinished business.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, as I understand, the unfinished business is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now before the Senate.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to ask the Chair if a motion is now made to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 107, and adopted, whether that would have the effect of displacing the unanimous-consent agreement for a vote upon the armor-plate bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Although it is a mere abstract question at this stage, the Chair will answer that, before the adoption of the third clause of Rule XII, it undoubtedly would have the effect of displacing the unfinished business; but since the adoption of that clause of the rule the unfinished business seems to have acquired rather a more preferential aspect before the Senate. To make full answer of the Senator's question would require a little more investigation than the present occupant of the chair has made. He regards it as a very important question, and one upon which he is not going to rule unless compelled to do so in order to dispatch business this afternoon. In all probability he will vacate the chair on Monday, when the Vice President will be here, and the matter can receive ampler attention than it is likely to receive this afternoon. The Chair expresses the hope that the matter may not be pressed at this time.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will not enforce a ruling.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I do not know the record with regard to Supt. Carroll. He may be quite a bad man; but all that I wished to state was that the record before the committee was that these operators believed from Carroll's letter that they would be credited according to the activity and diligence which they had shown as tenants in drilling, and that was one of the arguments upon which they based their plea for recognition of what they thought was a moral or ethical right.

I do not think that I ought to weary the Senate any longer with regard to this matter. I believe I have sufficiently explained the purpose of the resolution. I agree with the Senator from Iowa with regard to the error of language that was used; and if this matter comes up in a form where it may be amended I will ask to have it amended so as to express merely the opinion of the Senate, as it was intended to do.

With the permission of the Senate, I shall insert certain telegrams which I have received in reference to this matter.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

Senator ASHURST,

The corporation commission is charged with the duty, under our laws, of prescribing rules and regulations for the conservation of oil and gas. Under the regulations prescribed millions of dollars' worth of gas have been saved and the reckless drilling and destruction of oil fields by drilling in salt water has been prevented. Short-term leases, as discussed before your committee as to Osage lands, may have a very serious effect, by forcing the lessor to drill and produce oil in such a reckless manner and large quantities and force it on the market at a time when the price is wholly inadequate. Our experience is that best results are obtained to the landowner and the lessor on leases of sufficient length of time to enable the lessor to develop the property at times and under conditions that the lessor can conform to the State regulations and not force an unreasonable amount of oil on the market at one time, so as to unreasonably depress prices. The large pipe-line companies—that is, the subsidiaries of the Standard—invite a condition that would force lessors to develop property in the shortest possible time, reducing prices to 40 cents per barrel, as existed one year ago.

Washington, D. C.:

We feel that it is to the best interests of the lessor and lessee that leases should be executed in perpetuity. Otherwise it leaves matters in an unsettled condition and does not work to the best interests of all parties concerned. After full investigation we find this is the custom in the oil country.

T. J. ELLIS, Jr.,
Special Agent School Land Commissioners.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and this subject was discussed in my presence. It developed that there was a man by the name of Barnsdall, who had gone into that country many years ago and began to bore holes hunting for oil. He bored wells under a sublease, which he obtained from some company which had a prior right. He borrowed about $7,500,000 in all from the Standard Oil Co. He is said to have cleared about $2,000,000 in his operations, and had "put the money back," as miners say, "into the ground"—that is, in developing more oil wells on more land—until by his indefatigable perseverance he got hold of about 340,000 acres of land, which was an immense tract of land for one man to hold. That gentleman had a ravenous appetite for land. If there had been 200 more like him in Oklahoma, there would be no place for anybody else to live. He was insatiable; he was a very cormorant for land and for oil; and, of course, I admired him for the gift that God had given him to grab all the land that he could get hold of. He is a lovable old fellow personally; but, by some hook or crook, he got himself into the hands of the Standard Oil Co. He borrowed $7,500,000 from them, as I have said, and then allowed them to appoint the majority of the board of directors of his company and to appoint a manager of his business to operate the wells he was so busily digging. Upon this borrowed capital and the other money which he made day by day from the oil wells he kept reaching out for more. He was sure to lose. He exhausted his credit, but he bored wells as long as he could borrow a dollar or get hold of a dollar from the Standard Co. with which to bore them. He came to the committee in a most pitiable condition of despair. I believe, outside of his hunger for oil land, he is a good man. Under the terms offered him by the Government he was allowed to recoup himself for certain of the improvements which he had made upon the land, such as the casing of the wells and perhaps some of the machinery. He was allowed to have for his benefit what the Government could sell the improvements for. He ought to have an equal right with anybody else, however, in the future in competing for the new leases, and I am willing to give it to him; but I do not think that he ought to be turned loose on these Indians again; because, if he is, in 10 years more he will perhaps have the whole country staked out in his name and perhaps under the supervision of the good old Standard Oil Co.

As to the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I wish to say frankly that in the committee I did not vote for it. I was not there when the vote was taken. I do not believe in it for several reasons. In the first place, even this man Barnsdall offered better terms than it is now proposing to ask of him. In other words, we make the payment one-sixth, while he offered the Indians one-fifth. The Senator's resolution refuses to take it, but proposes to give him a large amount of this land for a royalty of one-sixth. It is too generous. It has "gone him one better" and cut his bid down.

I am told that 90 per cent of the Indians on the Osage Reservation, who own this property, the full owners of it, are against this resolution. They do not want the property parted with on these terms. What they do want is to put it upon the open market for free and open competition on its merits, on a system of shares, just as land is rented in all parts of the country on a percentage or royalty basis without a bonus.

That very bonus question goes to the heart of things. Under the terms offered by the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Bureau the royalty, the percentage of the return from the product of the land, was fixed at one-sixth, and then there were to be bids upon a bonus over and above the royalty before one could secure a lease of these lands. By that policy or scheme the majority of the people of the country were excluded from bidding at all. The majority of the people of this country have no ready money with which to bid under a bonus plan, and Barnsdall himself had gotten so in debt to the Standard Oil Co. that he could not put up a bonus. He could not bid on a bonus basis. He has his property, with pumping apparatus and machinery upon it, but he would have to go into the market and bid on a fixed royalty basis, and then bid cash on a bonus basis against somebody else who wanted it, and he did not have the cash. Suppose that "John D." wanted it, or some of his friends or relatives, and poor old Barnsdall came up there to bid or bet against them as to what that oil land would be worth. You can very readily see what would happen to Brother Barnsdall; and every other citizen of the United States would be in just the same position as Barnsdall would.

Barnsdall has pirouetted around all over that country and hunted out every spot where he thought oil could be found and bored wells, and then when it comes to the end of the lease he has got to put up a cash bonus or lose his holdings. That is his unfortunate position. I have a great deal of sympathy with that man, but I hope, for the Indians' sake, that no more of his family locate among the Osages. As I have said before, he is too greedy for oil land.

The Indians received one-eighth of the product of the wells. Mr. Barnsdall gave one-sixth of the product of his wells to a subsidiary company of the Standard Oil Co. He did not have any other regular customer; that is, he did not dare have any other customer; for he had to pay his debt of $7,500,000, and he could not do it unless he made arrangements with the Standard Oil Co. So he paid that one-sixth of his product to the Standard Oil Co. or to a subsidiary company. At the same time the Indians got one-eighth. At that time, and during pretty nearly all the time of the leases, I presume, the price of oil had been down to sometimes as low as 27 cents, ranging from that price up to 30 and 40 cents and even a dollar a barrel. At this time the price is $1.40.

All during these leases the Indians received for the natural gas which came from some of these wells, and I want Senators to listen to this, because most of them buy gas and pay for it at the first of each month—the Indians received one-tenth of 1 cent for a thousand cubic feet of gas—1 mill—a pretty low price for gas.

When this matter came up, an offer came in from Barnsdall that he would pay one-fifth all down the line for oil, for the well which only produced 1 barrel a day and for the well which produced 25 barrels or more per day. It must be remembered that in operating a well producing only 1 or 2 barrels a day there is very little profit, in fact the operator is likely to make a loss if he is not careful, although the pumping of an oil well is not an expensive proposition. Mr. Barnsdall said his improvements on these oil lands and his casings were matters of minor importance, and I believe they are. The Indians were to receive and did receive about one-tenth of a cent for the gas, and for the oil they got one-eighth. Prior to that time they had only received one-tenth royalty for oil. The Indians were not quite satisfied with that. Oil in the meantime had gone up to $1.30, and now it has gone up to $1.40. Assurances had been given to these oil-well men that their interests would be protected, or, at least, that they would be tenderly treated by the superintendent in charge, who was a partner of some of the oil men, the oil operators, themselves, who owned stock in the company, and at the same time represented the Indians and the Government. Senators will see where the interests of the Osage Indians would be under such conditions, and where they would finally arrive.

The Indians want none of it; they are not in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma, which passed the committee, I am informed, by a vote of 5 to 3. I am not in favor of it. I want to do the thing which you would want done with your property or which you would demand if you were interested in lands of this kind, namely, that you have a voice in the disposition of your property. The Indians ask for that, and they ask for no more. I am going to submit a substitute for the pending resolution which I have been asked to submit by the Indians, or by the representatives of the council of the Indians, and, as I understand, a majority of the Indians themselves on that reservation, providing that leases on these lands be sold to the highest bidder on the royalty basis, a certain percentage to go to the owner of the land, a certain percentage to the operator, just as in the case of lands in the East and in the West which are rented to tenants for a percentage of the crop—a third, a half, or a fourth, or whatever it may be. Mining companies let their mining property out on just such terms. It is fair to all. You can go right into the mouth of the well and put a measure or a meter on the oil. One-fifth or one-sixth would, perhaps, be ample for a small well. The Indians have been offered as high as a half royalty for large wells. Offers have been made of half the product of wells producing 100 barrels a day. It is a more valuable property; but it is a good bargain, even at that price, and yet the Indians are confined under this resolution to one-fifth and one-sixth for two years, and God alone knows how much longer; for if you let the oil experts in you do not know how long they will continue to investigate, and after a while the Indians will be deprived of the present high prices. The right thing to do is to let them share prosperity when the price of oil is high, and when the price goes down and the profits become small let them suffer their just share of the decline. That is fair to all, and that is all the Indians ask. Mr. Barnsdall told me himself that he preferred a royalty plan to the plan proposed by the Government.

I think we ought to take hold of this matter upon a basis of royalties which the Indians and everybody else can understand and concerning which they do not have to have the opinion of an oil expert and lease the lands on that basis. As I said a while ago, the Indians do now know what they are going to get. They desire to ascertain and receive the value of their property, and so they have thrown themselves on the mercy of this Congress in opposition to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma.

I am going to offer a substitute now, and I am going to read it, and I want Senators to hear its provisions. It is entitled a "Joint resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Interior to adopt a royalty system in place of a bonus and royalty system in the sale of leases on the Osage oil lands."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLAPP. I notice the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. The question is—of course, debate may proceed on any pending matter before the Senate—whether the transaction of other business until the armor-plate bill has been temporarily laid aside will supplant the right of way of that bill. I have no objection to the Senator offering any amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon, as the Chair understands, is not going to offer an amendment at this time. He is going to read it as part of his remarks and let it go in the RECORD in that way.

Mr. LANE. I am reading it as part of my remarks, to explain what I am talking about.

Mr. CLAPP. I understood the Senator to say he was going to offer it——

Mr. LANE. I am later on——

Mr. CLAPP. And to avoid any complication I thought it was only proper to make the statement at this time. I am not opposing the resolution.

Mr. LANE. The joint resolution has heretofore been introduced, and I am reading the resolution for information. Here is what the Indians want——

Mr. CLAPP. If it has already been introduced, my inquiry would have no application.

Mr. LANE. It was introduced February 17. I continue the reading:

Whereas it is the policy of the Department of the Interior to sell leases to operate oil and gas wells upon the lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma to the person or persons who tender the largest cash bonus over and above a royalty fixed by the President of the United States—

He acting under the advice of the Indian Bureau, and they represented by a partner of the oil operators, if you please. You do not want to forget the connection—

Whereas this policy must necessarily, and actually does, exclude and prohibit the vast majority of the citizens of this country from bidding upon and securing leases of such lands for lack of the spot cash to pay the bonus; and

Whereas such discrimination eliminates many worthy persons from the bidding who could, and would, operate the property with profit to the Indians and to themselves if permitted to do so; and

Whereas the spot-cash bonus policy operates to the sole advantage of persons of large means who have, or can secure, ready cash; and

Whereas it is a policy which is mystifying and renders it uncertain whether the Osage Indians secure the best price, or even a fair price, for the use of their lands; and

Whereas if a policy of leasing the lands and receiving tenders upon the basis of a fixed percentage or so-called "royalty" based upon the output of such wells were adopted; and

Whereas the plan of leasing lands on a percentage of its production is so simple, so well known, and so fair in taking care of the property rights and equities of both the lessees and the owners of the lands and affords an opportunity to secure free, fair, and unlimited open competition for the sale of the aforesaid leases of the oil and gas lands of the Osage Indians without guessing or loss to anyone: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to adopt the policy of leasing such lands on royalties only, and to defer the sale of all leases upon the aforesaid lands until such time as he can definitely and certainly ascertain the actual value of the oil and gas wells now operating in the Osage Indians' oil field and then sell leases of the same to the person or persons offering the highest bid, based on a percentage of royalty basis, to such person or persons who give a good and sufficient bond to guarantee the faithful performance of their contracts.

That interferes with the just rights of no one. The Indians want it. The operators who are operating there now, everyone that I have talked to—and I have talked to a number of them—say they would be glad to get such a lease. It puts it on the basis of a fair valuation, upon definite ground. You can measure the oil with a meter, and everybody knows what they are paying for, and the owners of the property know what they are getting. It does not, then, become a matter of contest to be fought out between any interests who are now operating there and others who are trying to secure holdings. It avoids the whole contest. It is the thing that ought to be done; and when the proper time comes I am going to ask the Senate, or those who have heard the remarks I have made here and my explanation, to accept it and to put the matter of these leases upon such a basis.

I know there are a number of the committee who are in favor of it. Take the oil; take the gas. The gas was to be let out to the old lessees under the new leases, which were to be let on the 16th of this month—first, I think, some time in February—at one-tenth of a cent per 1,000 cubic feet. Would you not like to get it for your house at that price? You would not have to buy coal. You could almost heat up the back yard and have a summer resort in winter and run a greenhouse and have a good time generally; but I am informed that is all the Indians have been getting for their gas. Then along came a man who offered the committee 3 cents per thousand cubic feet at the well, raising the price from one-tenth of 1 cent to 3 cents. That is a big increase in price for the Indians, and he told me that if he had to buy it from these other gentlemen, who would have paid to the Osages one-tenth of 1 cent, 1 mill, per thousand cubic feet, he would have had to pay 8 cents per thousand cubic feet for it, and that that was more than he could afford to pay.

I want him, as well as all others, to be allowed to come right into the field and bid on a royalty as against everybody else, on the square and in the open, and in free competition. I have an idea that if the gas were thrown on the market under the resolution which I have offered and shall press here it would sell for 4 or maybe 5 cents a thousand cubic feet; and that would mean many thousands of dollars to the Indian, who, under our management, when he needs money to pay his grocery bill or to buy a horse or a team of horses or a wagon or to buy a new dress for his wife has to go and borrow it from the brokers and pay 40 per cent per annum for it.

It is about time we stopped the juggling with the Indians' property, which has been going on so long.

RECESS.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., Saturday, March 11, 1916) the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 13, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate March 11, 1916.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Charles F. Curley, of Wilmington, Del., to be United States attorney for the district of Delaware, vice John P. Nields, whose term has expired.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate March 11, 1916.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Charles F. Curley to be United States attorney for the district of Delaware.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that down deep in the heart of man is that something which we call conscience, which sits in judgment upon his acts, upbraiding him when he does what he knows to be wrong, encouraging him when he does what he knows to be right, and which recognizes the strong, brave, heroic man who stands for the good of his fellow men; hence we thank Thee for the special order set apart in this House to-day in recognition of a strong, noble-minded, heroic man, who gave to his Territory, State, and Nation his thought and deeds for the betterment of conditions in a popular government.

It is well that the lawmakers of our land pause amid their activities and pay their tribute of respect and gratitude for the life, character, and public services of such a man, that they may be inspired to give themselves to the great work of purifying and ennobling the conditions of our beloved country, that they, too, may leave behind them a record which will stand the test of time and the approbation of not only their own conscience but the conscience of their fellow men. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report a bill making appropriations for further urgent deficiencies. (H. Rept. 316.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order on the bill. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the resolution (S. J. Res. 65) entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint commission of Congress to investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army."

PRINTING LETTERS FROM DEPARTMENT OF LABOR AS HOUSE DOCUMENT (H. DOC. NO. 886).

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print as a House document two letters from the Department of Labor, making suggestions as to administrative amendments to the immigration bill which has been reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document two letters from the Department of Labor on administrative features of the immigration bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman from Alabama that he desires to have these published as a document?

Mr. BURNETT. As a House document.

Mr. SABATH. Why not put it in the RECORD?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, I think the objection to that would be that Members would frequently want to send out to the document room and secure it for the purpose of getting information on amendments, and this will be the easier method for them to get them.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the House will need this matter in the consideration of that bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. And it will be of more benefit to have it in that form?

Mr. BURNETT. It would be of much more benefit than it would be in the RECORD.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman from Illinois think we ought to have that published?

Mr. MANN. I think anything of that sort that is sure to come before the House is advisable so Members may have it without any extra trouble when the bill is up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, because I did not hear, just what these documents are.

Mr. BURNETT. They are two letters from the Secretary of Labor, Department of Labor, suggesting administrative amendments to the immigration bill while it was being considered by the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman if one of those recommendations is that the Secretary of Labor be given discretion with respect to the deportation of certain immigrants?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, I do not remember all of them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that because it is fair to know whether the Secretary is making recommendations on both sides of the question.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, the document will show for itself. There are recommendations in some cases giving rights of appeal to the Secretary, but I think it is along the same line of the suggestions that we had before us when the committee was considering it before.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do these recommendations pertain to the immigration bill, which is shortly to come before the House?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DECISION CONCERNING CERTAIN INDIANS IN MINNESOTA (H. DOC. NO. 885).

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior on the question of the status of certain Indians in Minnesota be printed as a House document. It is only a short decision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a decision as to the status of certain Indians in Minnesota. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who is the decision by?

Mr. STEENERSON. The Secretary of the Interior. It will only cost a few dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 164 (H. Rept. 317).

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Claims be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an additional clerk to said committee for a period of three months, who shall receive for his services the sum of $75 per month, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for an additional clerk to the Committee on Claims for the period of three months, at a salary of $75 per month. That committee has a vast amount of work to do, and I think there can be no question but what this additional clerk is needed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman, This is merely a session clerk?

Mr. LLOYD. It is only for three months.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

TWO TELEPHONE MESSENGERS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 142 (H. Rept. 318).

Resolved, That the salaries of the two messengers in charge of telephones (one for the minority) be increased to $1,500 each: Provided, That the said increase be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives until otherwise provided by law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the chairman of the committee tell the House what they are now receiving?

Mr. LLOYD. They receive $1,200 each at the present time, and this increases it to $1,500. Mr. Chaffee, on the Republican side, is the person now receiving the salary, and I am advised that he is a man that is entitled to very much more salary than $1,200 for the services rendered; and in order to treat both sides alike, we provide that the salary for the minority man and the majority man be made the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the salary for assistant telephone messenger?

Mr. LLOYD. Seventy-five dollars a month.

Mr. STAFFORD. For the entire year?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATEMENTS MADE BY MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for 10 minutes, and the House will be in order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago there appeared in the public press two remarkable statements made by Members of this House—the Hon. ROBERT N. PAGE, of North Carolina, and Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Ohio—which deserve to be placed in the enduring records of Congress, and for this reason I will include them as a part of my remarks.

The declared purpose of these gentleman is to return to private life, and their reasons are given in the statements mentioned. Mr. Speaker, the excuses assigned for retirement are, in my judgment, all convincing why our colleagues should continue their invaluable services in this House. No constituency should permit, if possible, the withdrawal of men from Congress who possess the ability, the energy, the training, experience, courage, and patriotism of the Members from North Carolina and Ohio. [Applause.] If the proposition was submitted to this House, I am sure there would be a unanimous vote of confidence and a desire to have these honored Members, who enjoy the respect and friendship of every Member, regardless of political affiliation, remain in Congress as long as they desire. North Carolina is honored in having upon the rolls of her able delegation the name of ROBERT N. PAGE, and will, with this House and the Nation, suffer a loss if he should retire. [Applause.] His refusal to surrender his honest convictions and violate his conscience on a great public question is convincing proof of his greatness and entitles him to the admiration, loyalty, and devotion of his constituents and the respect of every American. [Applause.]

All I have justly said about our colleague from North Carolina can be truthfully said of the Member from Ohio who never failed to prove his great courage, not only in war but during his patriotic service in Congress. The survivors of the Union Army and their millions of friends will always love and revere the name of ISAAC R. SHERWOOD [applause], who should, by common consent, be returned to Congress as long as he lives. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the poet had in mind men like our two colleagues when he gave utterance to the following:

God give us men!
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy,
Men whom the lust of power will not kill,
Men who are honest, men who will not lie,
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flattery without winking;
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

[Applause.]

MR. PAGE'S STATEMENT.

[From the Washington Post.]

Many patriotic citizens of North Carolina are writing me and wiring me to support the President in his diplomatic controversies with European countries. Many, just as patriotic, are telling me to support a resolution warning American citizens against taking passage on armed vessels of belligerent countries.

The Constitution vests in the President all diplomatic questions, and I as one Member of Congress am willing that he should exercise this prerogative. I do not think that Congress or any other large body of men can successfully negotiate matters of diplomacy with other countries. When the President demanded that Congress pass upon a resolution warning American citizens against taking passage on armed vessels of belligerent nations I suggested the following resolution:

"Whereas the Constitution vests in the President all matters of diplomacy:

"Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled hereby express confidence in the President in the exercise of this prerogative for the protection of the lives and liberties of American citizens and the honor and peace of the Republic."

SAYS IT SHIFTS RESPONSIBILITY.

The President is not satisfied with an unreserved expression of confidence on the part of Congress, but demands a vote upon the warning of American citizens to refrain from using armed vessels of belligerent countries, asking that it be voted down. This shifts to the conscience and convictions of Members of Congress a responsibility that the Constitution imposed upon the Executive. Having the responsibility thrust upon me. I claim the right to exercise my own judgment and convictions and not have them dictated by some one else. I do not believe that an American should insist upon the exercise of any abstract right that will jeopardize the peace of his country.

To vote against a resolution of warning places upon me the responsibility for the death of all Americans who, in absence of such warning, may lose their lives by the destruction of an armed vessel of some one of the warring powers, and perhaps thereby plunge this country into war. I can not gain the consent of my conscience, much as I would like to gratify the President and meet what seems to be the demands of my constituents, regardless of my own conscientious convictions, to in every matter vote as the President requests, thereby assuming responsibility for the loss of a single American life, or even indirectly stain my hands with his blood.

In this instance I am sure that I am in possession of facts which a partial press has kept the people I represent in ignorance of.

QUOTES SAVIOR'S UTTERANCE.

Jesus Christ never uttered a more profound truth than when He declared, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." The loan of $500,000,000 to England by American capitalists, to say nothing of the profits of munition manufacturers, has destroyed the semblance even of neutrality in the United States and will probably lead us into war. I have no pro-German or pro anything sentiment or inclination other than pro-American. I realize very forcibly my obligation and responsibility to my immediate constituency and to the American people. I will not stultify my conscience or stain my hands with the blood of my countrymen, neither will I do violence to my conscientious conviction of duty, thereby forfeiting my self-respect.

And now while so far as I am informed I would have no opposition for renomination in the approaching primary, I desire to announce that I will not be a candidate for the nomination.

I can never express the depth of my gratitude to the Democrats of the seventh district for their support and friendship. I would not be in any degree worthy of it if I did not maintain my self-respect and intellectual integrity by retiring instead of remaining your Representative without either.

GEN. SHERWOOD'S STATEMENT.

[From the New York American.]

It is evident to my mind that the St. Louis convention will adopt a platform that would carry the country into militarism, with the biggest Army and Navy in the world. I am opposed to militarism, and have been since the Civil War. I have made speeches in every Congress against it.

I think it is due the Democrats in my district to have a candidate in harmony with the platform, some candidate who believes in the military propaganda being exploited and indorsed by the President. Therefore not to embarrass the party, I thought I would decline to be a candidate.

This is the first time in the history of the country when any political party and any President have advocated in time of profound peace the biggest Army and Navy in the world. I think it is a departure from the policy founded by the fathers and a step in the direction of a military autocracy. I am not standing for it.

I voted to-day to table the McLemore resolution against my better judgment, so that I will not be accused of any disloyalty to the President or the party. Since they made this a party question, I voted as a loyal member of the Democratic Party on this resolution, though my convictions are strong the other way.

I would vote, if I had the opportunity, to warn all American citizens off armed merchantmen. The talk of international law is a farce, as applied to the present situation. There is no international law touching submarines. It is a new instrument of warfare. We are building submarines now, and I suppose we will use them, if we have war, as England and Germany are using them.

Any merchantman armed with a gun is in reality an armed cruiser so far as the submarine is concerned. This was recognized and acknowledged in the note of the President of January 16 to the allied Governments.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Labor to provide and pay for the medical examination of employees of the United States receiving compensation for injuries under the provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, as directed by section 5 of said act, and for clerical assistance in its administration, and for subsistence, transportation, and traveling expenses of officers and employees of the Bureau of Labor Statistics while traveling on duty away from their homes and outside of the District of Columbia while engaged in the investigation of claims arising under the provisions of said act, $3,000.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 140, line 14, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,800."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment simply to increase this appropriation $800. The Bureau of Labor Statistics has had the work of carrying out the provisions of the workmen's compensation act of 1908. I have received some information from that department as to the necessity for this extra $800, which I will read for the information of the House:

The volume of work in connection with the administration of the Government workmen's compensation act of May 30, 1908, which is carried on by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, is constantly increasing, and has now reached such proportions that the appropriation of $3,000 for the administration of the act, which is the amount originally appropriated when the law was placed upon the statute books, is inadequate to properly carry on the work in question.

The act of May 30, 1908, went into effect August 1, 1908, and during the first 11 months of its administration, i. e., from August 1, 1908, to June 30, 1909, a period of 11 months, 4,887 accidents were reported and 1,818 claims for compensation on account of accident were submitted. During the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1909, a total of 6,989 accidents were reported and a total of 2,656 claims for compensation were received. Of these numbers, however, 1,240 accidents were reported and 1,220 claims for compensation were received from employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission alone. Eliminating the Isthmian Canal Commission cases, there were 5,749 accidents reported and 1,436 claims received from employees of branches of the service covered by the act other than the Isthmian Canal Commission. By Executive order of February 26, 1913, which went into effect March 1, 1913, the administration of the compensation law, so far as employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission were concerned, was placed in the hands of the commission itself. Notwithstanding that fact, there has been a constantly increasing number of accidents reported and number of claims for compensation received. By an amendment of March 11, 1912, the provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, were held to apply to employees engaged in hazardous work under the Bureau of Mines and the Forestry Service of the United States, and by an amendment of July 27, 1912, the benefits of the act were extended to persons employed in hazardous employment in the Lighthouse Service. There are, however, very few accidents and claims for compensation received from employees of the three branches of the service to which the benefits of the original act were extended by these two amendments. The fact that the compensation law for employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission has since March 1, 1913, been administered by officials of the canal has, however, not resulted in a decrease in the number of cases handled in the administration of this act, but, on the other hand, there has been a very marked increase in other branches of the service to which the act applies. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, there were 5,773 accidents reported and 2,558 claims were received. The fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, shows a large increase over the preceding year, with a total of 6,709 injuries reported and 3,140 claims for compensation received.

The increase still continues, and if the same proportion of increase in 1915 over 1914 is maintained, as is indicated during the first six months of the current fiscal year, it is estimated that there will be a total of approximately 7,200 injuries reported and approximately 3,500 claims received for compensation.

In spite of the large increase in the volume of work involved in the administration of the compensation act and its amendments, there has never been an increase in the amount of the original appropriation—$3,000 per annum—for the administration of the law, and that amount is now totally insufficient to meet the necessary expenses. The situation is so serious at this time that it has been necessary to curtail the number of medical examinations of injured employees for which the act provides, and it has also become impossible to make any of the investigations authorized by this law, as stated in lines 9 to 13, inclusive, page 140, of H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, now under discussion, and contemplated in the act of May 30, 1908, itself. An addition of $800 to the amount named in the bill—$3,000—is of prime necessity if the law is to be adequately and properly administered.

Mr. Chairman, I think the administration of the compensation law is very important. The amendment is a very moderate one, and I believe the Bureau of Labor Statistics ought to be allowed this additional amount.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. May I inquire who is the author of the communication?

Mr. NOLAN. The statistician of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. WALSH. And was that information presented to the committee?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not know whether it was presented in such a concrete form or not, but I asked for it and received it. I have not looked over the hearings, and I do not know whether the committee was advised to that effect or not.

Mr. WALSH. The department asks for this additional $800?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; they asked for the additional $800.

Mr. WALSH. The committee did not recommend it?

Mr. NOLAN. I am informed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that they did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, it will not provide money for the examination of a single additional case. It only means the promotion of two clerks in this division, according to the hearings submitted to the committee. He proposes to increase one clerk from $1,200 to $1,600 and another clerk in the sum of $300. So I repeat that if this amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is adopted, it means only the promotion of two clerks in that division and will not take care of the situation as the gentleman seems to think it will. And for that reason the committee, feeling that these promotions were not necessary at this time, allowed only the amount provided for the current year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Children's Bureau: Chief, $5,000; assistant chief, $2,400; experts—1 on sanitation $2,800, industrial $2,000, social service $2,000, librarian $2,000, statistical $2,000; special agents—1 $1,800, 4 at $1,600 each, 10 at $1,400 each, 12 at $1,200 each; private secretary to chief of bureau, $1,500; clerks—2 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 18 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each; copyist; messenger; in all, $106,640.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I do not at present recall just what the estimate was for the Children's Bureau. I would like to ask the gentleman how nearly this item in the bill comes to the estimates?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The estimates called for $19,000 in round figures more than this appropriation carries in the bill.

Mr. MANN. May I ask what that $19,000 was for?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was for additional clerical force in the bureau and also an increase of some salaries, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I shall not offer any amendment to the item, Mr. Chairman, although I would like to say that I think this bureau is doing exceedingly good work and is worthy of some expansion.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that for the fiscal year 1913 there was appropriated $25,640, and this year, which is only three years later, it is $106,640, so that there has been a marvelous expansion.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that the bureau is a new one, and the first appropriation was, I believe, about $25,000, and the Committee on Appropriations, disregarding the needs of the situation, asked the House to follow the same appropriation, or practically the same, in the succeeding year. But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], while a member of the Committee on Appropriations, just ran all over the Committee on Appropriations and chewed them up and put this item in the bill. Since then, of course, the Committee on Appropriations has allowed something, but did not allow this voluntarily.

Mr. SISSON. I do not want to get into a controversy with the gentleman as to whether the committee did or did not do right, but the gentleman has made the statement that there is no increase materially in the appropriation for this bureau.

Mr. MANN. There has been no increase for next year provided for. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. In 1914 it is the same amount, $25,640, and for 1915 it is the same amount, and then in 1915 an additional appropriation of $81,000 was carried in a deficiency bill. This year the amount is $106,640.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that it was not carried in the deficiency bill, although I would not be certain about that. We had quite a controversy in the House on the subject, and we increased it very materially in a lump sum in order to get over the point of order which the gentleman in charge of the bill consistently and properly made, and we put in a considerable increase.

Mr. SISSON. It was $81,000.

Mr. MANN. The item carried in the bill was a Senate amendment.

Mr. SISSON. That was for the purpose of enabling the bureau at that time to make exactly the same organization that it wanted.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is through, I will make my statement.

Mr. SISSON. I am through.

Mr. MANN. We increased the amount in a lump-sum appropriation to get around a point of order, because that was the opinion of the House. The Senate segregated it into these items, which action was agreed to in the House, because the committee knew the sentiment of the House. Every dollar of this money has been well expended. There is a need for an expansion of the bureau. I hope, while no amendment will be offered here, possibly, that the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol will of their own motion make some increases in this bureau when the bill comes back to the House. If they do, I hope the House will agree to the increase. I think the bureau is worthy of some expansion. It has not received any at all in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Department of Labor: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the department, for which appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses are not specifically made, including the purchase of stationery, furniture, and repairs to the same, carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, laundry, street car tickets not exceeding $125, lighting and heating; maintenance and repair of a motor truck; purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of passenger-carrying vehicle for use of the Secretary and such other officials as exigency may require for official purposes; freight and express charges, postage to foreign countries, telegraph and telephone service, typewriters, adding machines and other labor-saving devices, including their exchange; repairs to the building occupied by the office of the Secretary of Labor; purchase of law books, books of reference, and periodicals not exceeding $300; in all, $36,100; and in addition thereto such sum as may be necessary, not in excess of $13,500, to facilitate the purchase, through the central purchasing office as provided in the act of June 17, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 531), of certain supplies for the Immigration Service, shall be deducted from the appropriation "Expenses of regulating immigration" made for the fiscal year 1917 and added to the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Department of Labor," for that year; and the total sum thereof shall be and constitute the appropriation for contingent expenses for the Department of Labor, to be expended through the central purchasing office (Division of Publications and Supplies), Department of Labor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph. I notice this paragraph provides, in lines 15 and 16, on page 142, for the "purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of passenger-carrying vehicle for use of the Secretary." My recollection is—I am not sure about it—that we passed a law providing that no money could be used for the purchase or maintenance of an automobile or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle unless specifically provided in the appropriation act, and heretofore we have used the language, I think, "automobile or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle."

Now, this is no specific provision for either one. Undoubtedly, the gentleman from Tennessee has the language of the law lying before him. Does it not require a specific appropriation to be expended either for an automobile or a horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle? To simply say "passenger-carrying vehicle" is not, I am afraid, a specific appropriation in accordance with the terms of that law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that the law to which he refers was passed July 16, 1914, and provides that—

No appropriation made in this or any other act shall be available for the purchase of any motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle for the service of any of the executive departments or other Government establishments, or any branch of the Government service, unless specific authority is given therefor.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think this is specific authority?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I read further:

And after the close of the fiscal year 1915 there shall not be expended out of any appropriation made by Congress any sum for purchase, maintenance, repair, or operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for any branch of the public service of the United States unless the same is specifically authorized by law.

Now, this is a specific authorization, as I understand it, within the meaning of this statute. The gentleman recalls the facts concerning the purchase of this automobile by the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. MANN. I do; but I am first addressing myself to the language. If this complies with the requirement of that law, then it would be sufficient to say "repair of a vehicle for the use of the Secretary." The law intended to require, if you could use the money for the purchase or maintenance of an automobile, to say so. That was the purpose of the act, and I think the law does that. This does not do that at all. This is just general language—"a passenger-carrying vehicle." Under the terms of that law, if that would cover an automobile, just to say "vehicle" would cover the same thing.

If it is the intention to permit the Secretary of Labor to purchase a new automobile, after he has had one or two in the last year or two, I think we ought to say so.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think this provision does say so.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so. They might get the auditor to pass the account, but it is not a compliance either with the letter or the spirit of that law, which says it must specifically provide if you are going to buy an automobile or maintain an automobile.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law provides for a specific authorization for a motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle. Now, this provision provides for the "purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of passenger-carrying vehicle for use of the Secretary."

Mr. MANN. Of passenger-carrying vehicles; but it does not provide for the purchase or maintenance of an automobile. If it did, just to say "vehicle" would be sufficient, because "vehicle" covers "automobile."

Mr. STAFFORD. But, if the gentleman will yield, there is a specific authorization for the purchase of some character of vehicle, and that meets the limitation of the law of 1914.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is the question. I do not think it does. The language of the law used to be for the maintenance of vehicles. Under that provision they purchased automobiles. Then the Congress provided specifically, or intended to provide, that an appropriation generally for vehicles should not be used for the purchase of an automobile unless specific authority was given for that purpose.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, the law requires a specific appropriation for either motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles.

Mr. MANN. It is possible that the auditor would pass it where Congress makes an appropriation of this kind, but it utterly lets down the law, because under that you could say "for the purchase and maintenance of a vehicle," and the auditor would probably say, "Well, it is the only vehicle they want." But both the language and the intent of the law were to provide that when Congress authorized the purchase of an automobile it should say so, and not leave it to the department to determine whether "vehicles" covered automobiles or not. And if we yield on that, why, you might as well repeal the law. Now, I was not in favor of the law when it was passed, but as long as it is the law I think we ought to uphold it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think, in justice to the committee, it should be stated that it was the intention of the committee to make no exception in favor of the Secretary of Labor against the heads of the other departments; but here was a situation where the Secretary of Labor, prior to the passage of the law to which the gentleman has referred, bought an automobile.

Mr. MANN. I will say that I never criticized him for that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure of that. The purchase was approved by the auditor, and possibly also by the Comptroller of the Treasury. Now, the Secretary has that automobile, of 1912 model. It is old and frequently needs repair, and it is thought that possibly during the next fiscal year it will be necessary for him to dispose of it in some way; and as he has this automobile, the committee felt, of course, that he should be given authority to exchange it for a more modern one and one that would meet the necessities of the case in the event that he thinks it necessary to make the exchange.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is another proposition. On that proposition I would like to say this——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to say that it was the intention of the committee to give to the Secretary of Labor the opportunity to exchange this automobile for a new one in the event that it should become necessary.

Mr. MANN. Why did not the committee say so? The Secretary, under the old law, bought an automobile, and Congress, in order to prevent that being done in the future, provided that it should not be done unless specifically authorized. We do not specifically authorize it here. I do not think I will make a point of order on it, but I would like to say that it seems to me that ordinarily one automobile ought to last a Secretary during one term of office. I know that many people think they ought to have a new automobile every year or every second year. I am not sure that it is advisable for Mr. Wilson to buy an automobile for the benefit of his successor.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say that this particular automobile is an Oakland, and, as I have stated, of the 1912 model. I think it was about 2 years old when the Secretary of Labor purchased it by way of exchanging two or three old broken-down horses and several old carriages. It was a second-hand automobile when he bought it. It was not new.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I will say to the gentleman that no Cabinet officer ever has any broken-down horses; and every Cabinet officer, under any administration—and I think properly—when he comes into office buys a new outfit at once or very soon after, including both the vehicle and the team, if it is a team-drawn vehicle, as is usually the case. Now, it is proposed here specifically to authorize the retiring Secretary, during his last year, to buy an automobile for the benefit of his successor. His successor may not want that brand.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman overlooks the fact that it may be the present Secretary. He may not have any successor for the next five years.

Mr. MANN. Even if it be the present Secretary, he will be the successor. He has to be named over again if he stays in, which is not at all likely. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I doubt the advisability of starting the practice of letting Cabinet officers, in their last year of service, buy expensive ornamental or useful things purely for personal use—for the use of their successors—though if I had my way about it I would give all Cabinet officers automobiles. When some friend—as is not infrequently the case—takes me riding in an automobile, and we pass by one of these old-fashioned, though new and expensive vehicles, with fine horses that cost $1,500 a pair, much more expensive than an automobile and much less satisfactory, I really feel ashamed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee were influenced to recommend this language by reason of the statement made by the Secretary that the automobile which he now has was secondhand when he bought it, and that it is not only out of date but that it is probable that at some time during the next fiscal year he will have to have an automobile.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the idea was that it would be more economical to buy a new machine at $1,500 than it would be to pay $1,600 for repairs during the next year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely. I think the statement was made, if I remember correctly, that it cost something like $1,300 or $1,400——

Mr. MADDEN. Thirteen hundred and sixty-eight dollars is what he said.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Thirteen hundred and sixty-eight dollars by way of repairs for this old machine.

Mr. MADDEN. And that is more than the car was worth when it was new.

Mr. MANN. If anyone made such a statement as that, it is untrue.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only say that that statement appears in the hearings.

Mr. MANN. I have examined the contingent expenses of the Department of Labor in reference to this automobile, and there has been no such sum expended, nor anything like it, for the repairing of the automobile. The total expenses, for the maintenance, the gasoline, the garage charges, and repairs have not amounted to that sum of money in the last fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois that there is nothing in the record to confirm the statement of the chairman——

Mr. MANN. I did not make any such statement. I said if there was such a statement it was not true.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the fact we can only rely on the officials acquainted with the automobile——

Mr. MANN. You can examine the contingent expenses which require a report.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). And rely upon the statement of officials at these hearings. In the estimates submitted to the committee is found the item of purchase, exchange, maintenance, repair of a passenger vehicle, $1,696.08. At the hearing we took occasion to find out about such an unusual expenditure for maintenance and upkeep of this machine. On page 1019 of the hearings, and prior pages, it is stated that the maintenance and operation of the machine was $328 and repairs $1,367. These were unusual repairs and an unusual amount. They were occasioned by the Secretary in the winter of 1913 purchasing a secondhand Oakland car of the make of 1912 after it had traveled something like 12,000 miles. It was a secondhand machine when he bought it, and he gave in exchange the carriages and horses that had been previously purchased by the Government. He paid $800 in the exchange. That is the condition that confronted the committee, and when it found that repairs of the old secondhand machine in one year amounted to $1,367 the committee thought it was more economical to authorize the purchase of a new machine even though the Secretary could use it but a few months until his term of office expires.

There is a manifest prejudice among some Members of this body against Cabinet members having use of automobiles. I say that prejudice is without foundation. In another item of the bill the other day we authorized the Secretary of the Navy to rent quarters for the keeping of horses.

One of the business men connected with this administration, and a successful business man in his own business, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, was examined by us on this very question. He has horses provided for his own use by the Government, and he also has his own automobile, maintained at his own expense, to take him around to the various bureaus to perform the duties of his office. He had tabulated the comparative costs of maintaining horse-drawn vehicles and automobiles, and he testified that it cost $1,000 to $2,000 more to maintain the present system of horse-drawn vehicles than it would if they had automobiles.

Mr. Chairman, I look forward in a very short time to seeing some modern method of conveyance extended to Cabinet officials from departments to their homes and around the District in the perfarmance of their duties. We now see them being conveyed in horse-drawn vehicles, which is away out of date and not considered modern in any community of the country. I look forward to the time in the near future when all Cabinet officials will be authorized to have automobiles and when they will be housed in a central garage, supervised by one set of mechanicians, instead of having each officer have a separate livery, at an expense of $1,000 for rental, and four persons to upkeep it, as Mr. Redfield testified, three receiving a salary of $660 each, and one of $840. There is no question whatever from the testimony, and it requires no testimony, to believe that the automobile is much more economical than four horses and four carriages maintained at Government expense for each Cabinet official.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that one year it was reported that the repairs on this machine cost $1,300 or $1,400. What year was that?

Mr. STAFFORD. The past year.

Mr. MANN. The past fiscal year?

Mr. STAFFORD. The fiscal year of 1915.

Mr. MANN. Then I will say that that statement is untrue, unless the items are hidden so that no one can discover them. I have gone through from one end to the other the expenses of the contingent account of the Department of Labor, checked off all the automobile items in it, and there has been no such sum expended that is shown by those items. Whether there is something hidden or not—and I will not say intentionally hidden—I can not say; but there is an automobile item in every month, sometimes two, and the total sum shown for maintenance, repairs, gasoline, garage expenses, and everything does not amount to $1,300.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can only say in reply that we examined the chief clerk of the Department of Labor and also the Secretary concerning the maintenance charges and upkeep of this automobile, and they confirmed the statement as to these respective amounts.

Mr. MANN. Why should you purchase the secondhand automobile, expend $1,300 on repairs in one year, when you can buy a new machine for less than that? That would not indicate a great degree of brilliancy on the part of the person who did it. For less than the sum that the gentleman says was expended for repairs they could buy new parts all the way through and have a new machine.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has not had experience with a secondhand machine; he has been wise in purchasing a new machine.

Mr. MANN. That is not a true statement, for I never purchased any new machine. The gentleman is trying to mislead the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman utilizes fine new machines.

Mr. MANN. I utilize a good many fine machines when I have the chance.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this colloquy is a very interesting one, and while it was being carried on between these distinguished gentlemen it occurred to me that it might be very interesting to the House to have some one tell a few facts.

The Post Office Department, through the Second Assistant Postmaster General, made a report to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and to the country that he was operating 14 automobiles in the city of Washington, and that they cost $18,000 a year, but of course everybody knows that the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster General must be a mistake; that it could not be done; and that the best possible cost of the operation would be at least $42,000.

When these gentlemen buy automobiles, at, say, $3,000 apiece, it costs to operate them, including the driver, at least $3,000 a year each. Then when you get through with the machine at the end of three years, if you have paid $3,000 for it, and you want to buy a new one, you must sell the machine for $500, so that you are really paying $2,500 in three years for wear and tear upon the machine, to say nothing about the repairs, to say nothing about the fact that you are paying the chauffeur $100 a month, and are paying in addition about $150 a month for incidentals. Therefore, when you come to talk about the economy of operating automobiles, you are talking about something that does not exist. Maintaining an automobile is not a poor man's game. It may be all well enough for a man to belong to a golf club and go out and play golf in the afternoon to keep up his physical force and all that, but if you want to bankrupt a private individual's treasury or the Treasury of the United States, all you have to do is to commence operating automobiles. Give these men in the Cabinet the right to purchase any kind of a machine they desire, and then fool you in their statements as to the cost of operation and maintenance, and it will be found to be a very expensive luxury.

If the Second Assistant Postmaster General, for example, tells you that he is doing for $18,000 by the operation of 14 automobiles what it cost $55,000 a year to do when he was doing it by horses, he is not stating all of the facts. If the Second Assistant Postmaster General would charge the wages of the men who are running the automobiles into the cost of the operation of the automobiles, he would find that it would cost him over $11,000 for their wages, to say nothing about the rest of the expenses connected with it; and if he would charge up the wear and tear and the depreciation, he would find that it would amount to about seven or eight thousand dollars a year, and that the gasoline would amount to about $6,000, or very close to that, while the repairs to the chassis would amount to a very large sum in addition to that, and then about $200 a year for each machine for tires. That is something which he has forgotten to charge. So all of these things are very interesting in connection with this piece of fiction to which we have been listening in the matter of the operation of the automobile that is owned by the Secretary of Labor, which he obtained in exchange for a lot of old, broken-winded horses, paying $800 in exchange for a second-hand machine which, when new, cost only $1,200, and then about $1,367 for repairs upon that machine, when he could buy a new one to replace it for $1,200 or less. It is an interesting method of financial calculation, conducted by scientific Democrats in charge of a great Government like the United States, and it is no wonder that the Treasury of the United States is bankrupt. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order that I may ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. In lines 15 and 16 and a part of 17 I find this language:

> Purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of passenger-carrying vehicle for use of the Secretary and such other officials as exigency may require for official purposes.

We have been talking about the purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of a passenger-carrying vehicle for the use of the Secretary, and in respect to that I desire to say that I have no objection to the Secretary having an automobile. I believe he ought to have one. But then comes the language:

And such other officials as exigency may require for official purposes.

I take it that under that language the Assistant Secretary or any other official who desires an automobile, if it met the discretion of the Secretary, could have an automobile. Is it the intention to give that authority?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will notice that it provides for the purchase of only one vehicle. The language referred to was inserted because the vehicle is intended for general departmental needs, subject to the control of the Secretary.

Mr. CANNON. I think it goes further than that. I will read it again:

And repair of passenger-carrying vehicle for use of the Secretary.

That covers the automobile, does it not?

And such other officials as exigency may require for official purposes.

That language is pretty broad.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman will notice that it provides for the purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of a passenger-carrying vehicle for the use of the Secretary and such other officials as may need it. In other words, the authorization is for only one.

Mr. CANNON. And there could be but one automobile purchased under that language?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. Perhaps the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee certainly did not intend to provide for any more, and I do not think the bill would authorize the purchase of more than one. The idea of the committee was that this vehicle should not be restricted to the sole use of the Secretary, but should be used for official business within the department under the direction of the Secretary.

Mr. CANNON. Talking about the expense of maintenance, I take it that in this and in other cases the chauffeur is a detailed employee, a clerk or a copyist or a messenger or a watchman?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is a fact.

Mr. CANNON. Carried on some other roll.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of Labor is authorized to enter into a contract for the lease of a modern fireproof building for the use of the Department of Labor for a period not to exceed five years, renewable, at the option of the Government for an additional period not exceeding five years, at an annual rental not exceeding $24,000 and at a rate per annum per square foot of available floor space not to exceed 36.3 cents.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order until I can at least explain to the gentleman the situation confronting this particular department?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know what confronts it, which is that some one is going to construct a new building on the pledge of the Government to lease and occupy it at a yearly rental of $24,000, and that by following this course the Government never will have any of the sites which it has owned for years used for Government buildings as they all ought to be. These people will erect another herring-box structure and lease it to the Government, and I make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman to reserve it for a moment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I desire to state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the facts surrounding this particular proposed authorization are different from some others. When the Department of Commerce moved out of what is known as the Willard Building on Fourteenth Street, the Department of Labor was left in the building, but that building was not sufficient to provide for all of its bureaus.

For instance, the Bureau of Naturalization was located on F Street. Now, for the remainder of the year the Department of Labor only had $16,500 authorization for the rent of the building. It was necessary to secure quarters for all of its bureaus. The Navy Department was occupying the Mills Building as a Navy annex, but moved out of that building. By reason of the fact that the owner of the Mills Building demanded an increase of rent from $24,000 to $30,000, Congress authorized the Navy Department to enter into a lease for another building for which it pays $30,000, but which provides probably one-third more space. Now, the Mills Building was vacant, and the owner of the building agreed for the balance of that year that the Department of Labor might occupy it at the rate of $16,500 a year. The next year $20,000 was appropriated by Congress for rental purposes for this department. The owner of that building finally agreed, after a great deal of haggling with the Secretary of Labor, to permit him to continue another year in that building at $20,000. Now he has declined to rent it for another year at $20,000 and is undertaking to hold that building for $26,000, and refuses to enter into any sort of a contract for one year or any other term of years for less than $26,000, and it is necessary for the Department of Labor to secure other quarters unless the sum of $26,000 is appropriated for the rent of that particular building.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How long will it take them to erect the new building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Secretary of Labor states, if it is authorized by this bill, that they can have it ready for occupancy a short time after the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly; and that shows that the building is to be a structure similar to those that are constantly being erected here and disfiguring the appearance of Washington. Anybody who will go to the Mall and look at the rear of some of the buildings on New York Avenue, great structures of red brick, and 10 or more stories high, will not fail to see that these constitute a positive, very serious disfigurement. There is a business of putting up buildings and renting them to the Government. The understanding usually arrived at is that if an authorization can be gotten through Congress they will put up a building that will be suitable and rent it to the Government for a term of years at an agreed rental.

The Government ought to erect buildings, which it has needed for many years, on the property which it bought years ago for sites for such buildings and has ever since owned. There never will be a stop put to this until we stop it in Congress, and I object and object now.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman says that on account of the time in which it is proposed to erect this building it means that it will be a makeshift building. I submit to the gentleman, if the authorization is carried in this bill, there will be four or five months between now and the beginning of the fiscal year, and possibly six or seven months before the building is ready for occupancy. Now, the committee felt that it was not to the interest of the Government to permit the owner of any building to attempt to hold up the Government every year for additional rent.

As I said, a few years ago, because the Navy Department had no other place to go, it was attempted to force Congress to allow $30,000 rent for that building. But the Navy Department annex moved out, and when Congress undertook to provide quarters for the Bureau of Labor, because this building was vacant, it was offered to the Department of Labor for the remainder of the year at $16,500. The next year the Department of Labor was only authorized to expend $20,000, and it was rented at that price for another year. But now he is seeking to force Congress to appropriate $26,000 for the rent of that building. Now, I do not think that Congress ought to put itself in a position or leave itself in a position where the owner of any building can come and demand from Congress excess rent; and this authorization simply provides that the Secretary of Labor may enter into a rental for five years, with an option, at its pleasure, of five years longer, at $24,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Ten years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And limits the amount of rental of floor space at 36.3 cents per square foot, which is the amount paid for other buildings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman to put me in a position—as he very adroitly, perhaps unintentionally, attempts to do——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not desire or intend to put the gentleman in any false position.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of favoring the owner. Now, I do not know the owner of that building nor of any other building that the Government occupies in this city. I may have met some of the owners; but if so, I do not know it. None of them has ever spoken to me on this subject; and the gentleman must not, by adroitly alleging that this man is holding up the Government, suggest that I am in league with him. The Government continually, through such legislation as is proposed by this bill, puts itself in a position where it can be held up, and has been held up, to the extent of many thousands of dollars for rents in this city. I saw the other day, as the gentleman did, a circular showing that some of these buildings now rented by the Government net the owners 15 per cent a year; others 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, and 12 per cent a year. The Government can borrow money at 3 per cent or less.

The Government has for years owned that row of building sites beginning with the block in which the Poli Theater is located on down Fifteenth Street to the Mall, but, for example, instead of putting Government buildings there we induced a corporation to put up a building at the corner of Nineteenth Street and the Avenue and rent it to the Government for the Department of Commerce; and, as was first brought out by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] two years ago, one of the men interested in the structure was an employee in that department. There is a regular business here in this town of putting through things of this kind, a well-organized system of inducing the Government of the United States to agree in advance to rent buildings to be erected by private parties. A day or two ago we had before us a provision, on page 119 of this bill, providing that the Attorney General might enter into a contract for the putting up of a building here under an agreement that the Government would rent it for the use of his department at $36,000 a year—4 per cent on $900,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is what the department, if the gentleman will permit me, is paying now for rent and has been for quite a number of years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly. And the gentleman does not propose to better the situation at all. Public opinion has been aroused, and the people demand that these outrageous rents paid by the Government shall be stopped. Why not have the Government build structures, not extravagant, but architecturally fine, in keeping with the character of the National Capital City, on the sites that for years the Government has owned?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] make the point of order?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I do not wish the Appropriation Committee to be put in a false position. I want to call his attention to a fact with which he is entirely familiar, that the Appropriation Committee has absolutely no authority to authorize the erection of public buildings. That legislation must come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. All the Appropriation Committee can do is to recommend to the House provisions for rental of quarters for the departments which are not supplied with Government buildings, and that is what it is seeking to do here.

Here is a situation where the Department of Labor has got to move on July 1 unless it can enter into some terms with the present owner of the building, and he is insisting that he must have $26,000 a year or they must get out. Now, some provision must be made for the department, and the committee felt that if the Secretary could secure a proper building, adequate for all the needs of the department, for $24,000 for a period of five years, with an option to rent it for five years additional, it was not only economy but, as a matter of fact, it was an absolute necessity in order to provide quarters for that great department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This provision provides for an initial lease of 5 years, with an option for its renewal for 5 years more. That means, as everybody knows, a 10-year lease of a building put up for the express purpose of renting it to the Government at a rental agreed upon in advance, and with nobody able to tell where that building will be located nor what it will look like.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order, but the Chair's mind is made up.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this is an item for the purpose of bringing about some economy in this bill in reference to the rent of these buildings. Now, if we do not put this provision in the bill, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], by making the point of order, is bringing about a result where he does not take one single step toward the building of a magnificent building for the Department of Labor, where he is not hastening it a minute, and he will cost the Government the next fiscal year $2,000 more, at least, than the amount authorized in the bill. In addition to that, the Department of Labor says that the present owner of the building——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman talking to the point of order? If not, I make it.

Mr. SISSON. I am talking to the point of order and endeavoring to show how we are going to save some money. Now, if the gentleman is not desirous of saving money, if he is willing that the Government shall continue not only to pay the $2,000 more next year, but the following year, according to the testimony in the committee we will pay not only $2,000 more but $6,000 more for the building that they are in, because the present offer was made, and they say that while they are making the offer for this year at $26,000, next year they will want $30,000 for this building.

Now, your committee thought it would be better to put ourselves in a position where we would not favor this man that owns this building as a private individual and enable him to hold Congress up for $6,000. The condition the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] speaks of is a condition perhaps for which the majority of the Members of this House are not responsible, and that is that these men who own these buildings are just as much a part of that coterie the gentleman speaks of as these gentlemen who propose to put up buildings with larger and more floor space and give them a place in which to house themselves. In order to get up some competition among this real estate trust that the gentleman speaks of we will offer a competition here where we will have this building next year on the market for the Government, and we will be able to get loose from the trust that the gentleman from Wisconsin speaks of.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the clearest argument on the point of order I have ever heard.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants the committee to understand that the Chair's mind is thoroughly made up and that he is ready to rule.

Mr. MANN. That may be true, but the Chair is one of those distinguished gentlemen who is willing to change his mind if there be occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair always tries to do that way.

Mr. MANN. But I doubt if there is any occasion. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] endeavors to bring this under the provisions of the Holman rule on the ground that it reduces expenses. The Chair may not be fully informed as to all the facts in the case. The item in the bill, which the gentleman from Mississippi says will reduce expenses, authorizes the lease to be made at an annual rental of $24,000, while the existing law now in force authorizes the Secretary to make a lease at the annual rental for $20,000 a year.

Now, it would require a good deal of mathematics and figuring to show that while the law provides for a lease at $20,000 a year, it will reduce expenses by authorizing a lease at $24,000 a year. [Laughter.] The existing law authorizes the Secretary to make a lease of the building without any time limit at $20,000 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. He is not authorized to make a lease for more than a year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken.

> The Secretary of Labor is authorized * * * to enter into a contract for the lease for a period of not to exceed five years of a modern fireproof office building at an annual rental not to exceed $20,000.

I am reading the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am referring to the permanent law.

Mr. MANN. It does not make it permanent law, whether it is in an appropriation bill or not, if it is made law. The full provision is—

> That the Secretary of Labor is authorized, in his discretion, to enter into a contract for the lease for a period not to exceed five years of a modern fireproof office building at an annual rental not to exceed $20,000.

When I said lease "without any time limit" that was wrong; but he is authorized now to enter into a lease under the existing law for five years at $20,000. I think the committee did not know that. Certainly the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] did not know it, or he would not insist that the authorization to increase the limit of rental from $20,000 to $24,000 was a reduction of expenses.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not want to put anybody in a false light.

Mr. MANN. Never. I was reading the law.

Mr. SISSON. The fact is that that was the authorization last year—$20,000.

Mr. MANN. That is the law now.

Mr. SISSON. But the testimony of the Department of Labor in reference to the rental of this building is that they are unable to rent it for less than $26,000. That is the testimony here.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what that has got to do with the question at all. This is to authorize the Secretary to enter into a contract for the lease of some other building at $20,000.

Mr. SISSON. There is no other building that they can get.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we all know that that is not true.

Mr. SISSON. I know this, that they say it is true.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi and myself know that there are a great many buildings in Washington that are now in existence that can be leased for less than $20,000 a year, and many of them would fully answer the purpose of the Department of Labor, although they would not perhaps be in such a conspicuous place or be such fine-looking buildings.

Mr. SISSON. They say they can not get a building under one roof, and they can not get a building large enough to accommodate the Department of Labor unless they take two or three buildings. That is what they say to-day about it. The owner of this building wants $26,000.

Mr. MANN. I was arguing the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman that my argument on the point of order was largely for the purpose of getting the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. My point of order was on what the law is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like the gentleman from Mississippi to discuss the point of order if he desires to discuss it.

Mr. SISSON. I will desist from discussing it if the Chair desires. I did not want to leave the matter in an unenviable light.

In the Department of Justice they have four or five buildings scattered all over the city. If we do not give these people this authority, they may be compelled to move out of the building that they are now in, unless we are held up for $26,000 a year. Then there is a statement that they will not rent the building next year for less than $30,000. That is what confronted the committee. In view of the fact that this statement came from the people who occupied the building, we felt absolutely sure that that was true. They made investigations, and while the committee was conducting hearings for several days these men made investigations for the purpose of determining what they could do, and they came back to the committee with plans and specifications and with the statement that there was not a building that they could rent in the District of Columbia in which they could house all those people. I presume the committee knew.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not trouble the gentleman from Wisconsin to discuss the point of order, because the Chair is going to rule with the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was confident of that, but wish to say a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. The gentleman from Mississippi said that there is no prospect of the Government erecting a building for the Department of Justice, and that the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction to authorize the expenditure by the Government of its own funds for the purchase or construction of such a building.

That is very true, but the gentleman will remember that the newspapers early in this session contained a statement to the effect that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would report a bill for a Government building for the accommodation of the Department of Justice, a new building to be put up here in the near future. But, of course, that committee will not report anything for a building if Congress should enact into law the paragraph against which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of order a day or two ago.

Mr. SISSON. That will not take care of the Department of Labor, I submit to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The same principle applies to the Department of Labor.

Mr. SISSON. And it will not take care of the Department of Justice for years to come.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And, Mr. Chairman, I object to this at this time, because of an experience which I narrated the other day on the floor of the House, but which may not have been brought to the attention of some Members now present.

Two or three years ago, while talking with a bureau chief, he mentioned the name of a prominent Washington lobbyist who had been in his office several times, urging him to go before a committee of Congress and advocate an appropriation for a building to accommodate his bureau, the lobbyist saying that he or somebody else whom he knew would put up the building and rent it to the Government. Observing his manner, I asked the chief whether any sort of a proposition was made, or any intimation that there might be something in it to his advantage. His answer was, "He did not make any proposition, but from his manner and insistence I have no doubt that there could have been something in it for me."

That statement was to me a source of very great surprise. It was the first time I had ever heard any direct testimony on the subject. But the chief was a man of such high character and he made the statement under such circumstances that I believed him, of course.

The Government of the United States ought to own its own buildings; they ought not to be extravagant in the matter of cost, but yet dignified, fine, and in every way worthy of the Government of so great a Nation. One by one they should be constructed here and located in accordance with the carefully considered, comprehensive plan submitted long ago for the betterment of Washington. If, as the years pass away, these buildings are constructed one after another in accordance with that great plan, there will be a gradual harmonious improvement of the National Capital, a result that all the people of the country earnestly desire to have accomplished.

I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] makes the point of order that the provision on page 143 of the bill, lines 17 to 24, inclusive, is new legislation, and not in order on an appropriation bill. The Chair takes cognizance of the fact that the rental now paid or authorized to be paid by this department is $20,000 a year. The provision in question authorizes a rental of $24,000, so in no way can it come within the purview of the Holman rule. It is clearly legislation, and subject to a point of order, and the Chair sustains it. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDICIAL.

Supreme Court: Chief Justice, $15,000; 8 associate justices, at $14,500 each; marshal, $4,500; 9 stenographic clerks, 1 for the Chief Justice and 1 for each associate justice, at not exceeding $2,000 each; in all, $153,500.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In order that the RECORD may show the owners of the buildings occupied by the Department of Justice I will ask that the list which I hold in my hand, with the streets where the property is located, be read from the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BUILDINGS.

1435 K Street, Columbia Properties Co. (Sidney Bieber, secretary).
1439 K Street, Horace H. Wescott, agent for a Mrs. Peyson, who lives in France.
1000 Vermont Avenue, Woodbury Blair, executor for the estate.
1013 Fifteenth Street, Agnes M. Wickersham and Lillian F. Balloch.
6 Jackson Place, John B. Dahlgren and J. D. Coughlan, trustees.
8 Jackson Place, B. M. Randolph, one-third owner.
10 Jackson Place, William Corcoran Hill, agent for Mary J. Blair.
Southern Building, corporation.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in order to provide for the housing of the judicial department it will be necessary that we amend the bill here and add $4,000 for some improvements and necessary repairs on these buildings, and if we get quarters for the Department of Labor it will be necessary that we increase the appropriation, if they remain where they now are, from $20,000 a year to $26,000 a year, an increase of $6,000. In the two items this will mean for the next year an expenditure of $10,000 more than the committee would have expended in the event that the points of order had not been made. Therefore I believe that in the interest of economy it was a mistake to make these points of order, because we will not cure the condition in the Government, nor are these gentlemen who would build these buildings any worse or any better than the men who now rent buildings to the Government. I do not happen to have a personal acquaintance with any of these gentlemen, and, so far as I know, I am sure that no member of the committee has. Speaking for myself, I have never had any sort of conversation with them, directly or indirectly. The chairman states that he has not. For the reason that so much has been said about men coming and intimating that there would be something in this for somebody if certain things were done, I want to say that if anybody ever makes that statement to me, I will not simply invite him out of my office, but something else will occur.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. In view of the fact that we are paying over $600,000 a year rent in the District of Columbia, would it not be a good idea to invest a sufficient amount of money to put up the buildings that are needed to house the departments?

Mr. SISSON. That would cost many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and could not be done in one year.

Mr. MADDEN. To capitalize $600,000 would make a $20,000,000 investment.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman know that the specifications prepared for a building for the State Department a few years ago ran up to many millions of dollars, and in the building, according to the plans and specifications submitted, there was to have been a magnificent arched driveway, and on one side was the business office of the Secretary of State and on the other side were magnificent suites of rooms, called the royal suites, having from 10 to 15 rooms in one and from 10 to 12 in another and about 8 in another, for magnificent entertainments to be given at the cost of the Government; and when the matter was up before a deficiency committee on one occasion the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asked a few questions, which I will be perfectly willing to state to gentleman privately, but which I can not state here, and which absolutely destroyed all effort to get that sort of a building? If these plans had been carried out, the royal suites were to have in them liveried servants for the purpose of entertaining the royal families. When we asked the Supervising Architect about this he said he had prepared those plans and specifications at the direction of others and not of his own motion. When he was asked who did it, we did not force him to answer the question, because it was somebody higher up. Now, if these are the plans and specifications to be presented to Congress, I am not in favor of buildings of that sort.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. SISSON. I am in favor of constructing good buildings to be owned by the Government, to relieve us of this outrageous contention every year about somebody being improperly connected with these rental propositions, either directly or indirectly, either an official of the Government or some insinuation that somebody is doing something wrong about the rental of these buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Books for judicial officers: For purchase and rebinding of law books, including the exchange thereof, for United States judges, district attorneys, and other judicial officers, including the nine libraries of the United States circuit courts of appeals, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General: Provided, That such books shall in all cases be transmitted to their successors in office; all books purchased thereunder to be plainly marked, "The property of the United States," $16,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This morning, on a report from the Committee on Accounts, the House passed a resolution increasing the salary of the telephone messengers from $1,200 to $1,500, the excess to be paid out of the contingent fund. That will necessitate two checks. Under the rules of the House, if that had been done before this bill was reported the bill would have carried $1,500 for the next fiscal year. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 17, line 11, for the purpose of offering an amendment to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 17, to offer an amendment indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 11, strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That no part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the purchase of any typewriting machine at a price in excess of the lowest price paid by the Government of the United States for the same make and substantially the same model of machine during the fiscal year 1916; such price shall include the value of any typewriting machine or machines given in exchange, but shall not apply to special prices granted on typewriting machines used in schools of the District of Columbia or of the Indian Service, the lowest of which special prices paid for typewriting machines shall not be exceeded in future purchases for such schools.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph. I will ask the chairman of the committee, Is there any necessity of carrying this?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is a very grave necessity for carrying it, I will say to the gentleman. I have a substitute that I am very anxious to offer if his point of order is made and sustained against this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. That is the easiest way to do that. I make the point of order. The gentleman can offer his substitute and let us see whether it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee concedes the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

As a substitute for section 4, insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That appropriations in this or any other act shall not be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the purchase of any typewriting machine at a price in excess of the lowest price paid by the Government of the United States for the same make and substantially the same model of machine during the fiscal year 1915. Such price shall include the value of any typewritng machine or machines given in exchange, but shall not apply to special prices granted on typewriting machines used in schools of the District of Columbia or of the Indian Service, the lowest of which special prices paid for typewriting machines shall not be exceeded in future purchases for such schools: Provided, That in construing this section the Commissioner of Patents shall advise the Comptroller of the Treasury as to whether the changes in any typewriter are of such a structural character as to constitute a new machine not within the limitations of this section."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph. Is there any difficulty now in the way this operates?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have taken the trouble from time to time to go through the reports of the purchase of typewriters in the various departments in compliance with the law. They are not all made up on the same basis and not very intelligible to a man who is not a specialist in typewriters, which I am not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure the gentleman has examined the last report.

Mr. MANN. I have of the various departments.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I am quite sure that the gentleman has observed that there is now a uniformity in the price of typewriters which did not exist until this provision was put in the law.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, I think there is a lack of uniformity of price.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not for the same machine.

Mr. MANN. They may have been the same price but no one can tell. When they trade an old machine it does not make much difference about the price. It depends upon how much they trade in the machine for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that before this provision was inserted in the bill the Navy Department paid as low as $62.50, while other departments were paying $70, and as high as $80 for the same model of machine. This provision of the law inserted last year has absolutely corrected that inequality of price, and the departments now are paying a uniform price not exceeding $65, I think, for the same machine.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the price nominally paid, when you figure it out in fact, depends upon how much you get for the machine you turn in. If you turn in a $50 machine which you own, and buy one for $65, and only get credit for $10 on your machine that you turn in, that is not buying a machine for $65, and that is apparently what has been done in some cases. I do not say that it has been improperly done, because I do not know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to read him from the report submitted a year ago by Mr. Johnson of South Carolina, who then had charge of this bill, in which it was stated:

It was ascertained, from detailed statements furnished to the committee and printed in its hearings, that different departments of the Government paid, and are paying, varying prices for the same make and model of typewriting machines. For one make and model of machine the Navy Department paid $67.50, and other departments of the Government $80; for the same make but different model of machine the Navy Department paid $62.50, and other departments of the Government $77.50; for another make and model of machine the Departments of Commerce, Labor, and the Treasury paid $65, and other departments $80; for the same make but different model of machine the Departments of Commerce, Labor, and the Treasury paid $62.50, and other departments $78; for another make and model of machine the Post Office Department paid $50, and other departments $58.50; for another make and model of machine different offices of the Interior Department paid, respectively, $40.50, $45, and $47.50, and other departments $47.50.

These facts demonstrate that, with few exceptions, the Government is not securing uniformly as advantageous prices on typewriting machines as the large quantity purchased warrants, and for that reason the committee recommends the enactment of the provision.

Second. It was ascertained that the number of different makes of ordinary machines used was very large. It is believed that if a proper standard of the qualifications to be required for each class of typewriting machines used on the different classes of work necessitating the use of them is established by persons competent to do so, it will result in securing only machines that possess the best necessary qualifications to bring to the Government the most economical results in price, quality of work, and length of life of the machine.

Those were the facts developed before the committee a year ago and which brought about this provision. Within the last month the Comptroller of the Treasury has made a ruling which absolutely cuts the life out of this provision. I may say that in that ruling he has reversed a ruling he made probably a month before, and reversed the ruling of his predecessor in office, and this amendment, or the proviso, is intended to preserve this provision as it was put in a year ago.

The reversal came about in this way: The L. C. Smith Bros. Typewriter Co. submitted to the Interior Department a statement to the effect that they had made a material change in their typewriters, such a structural change as took it out from the provisions of this law, that it was no longer substantially the same model. The Interior Department referred it to the Commissioner of Patents, and some expert in the Patent Office rendered an opinion that it was not a substantial change.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the existing law about being "substantially the same."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. "Substantially the same model." The comptroller, notwithstanding the opinion of the Patent Office, rendered an opinion in which he said it was a substantial change, and therefore was not subject to the provisions of this law, and instead of $65 the L. C. Smith Bros. Typewriter Co. now insists on $70 for its machines. We think that this Government can afford to take the opinion of experts in the Patent Office on matters of this kind and be governed by it.

Mr. MANN. When the item went into the law I warned the gentleman that the language in the bill was for the same make and model, not substantially the same make and model, and that all a man had to do was to change the lettering on a key and call it a different model. Why does not the Supply Committee buy the typewriting machines?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman will find that in the present law it says "substantially the same model" of machine. It is in the sundry civil bill I am informed by the gentleman sitting on my right.

Mr. MANN. This item was carried in this bill last year:

SEC. 4. That no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used during the fiscal year 1916 for the purchase of any typewriting machine at a price in excess of the lowest price paid by the Government of the United States for the same make and model of machine during the period of the fiscal years 1913 and 1914; such price shall include the value of any typewriting machine or machines given in exchange, but shall not apply to special prices granted on typewriting machines used in schools of the District of Columbia or of the Indian Service, the lowest of which special prices paid for typewriting machines shall not be exceeded in future purchases for such schools.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is reading from what law?

Mr. MANN. From the legislative bill of last year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In the sundry civil law approved March 3, 1915, the gentleman will find the same language recommended in this amendment, reading "substantially the same model of machine."

Mr. MANN. Then there are two laws on the subject. I do not know which went into effect first, but probably the sundry civil. It shows how foolish an appropriation committee can be, trying to put two laws into force at the same time conflicting with each other.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will realize that this House, unfortunately, is not the only one which passes appropriation bills; and the Senate, I understand, proposed this particular provision.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Appropriations is the only body in this House which has charge of the legislative and sundry civil appropriation bills. They can not escape that responsibility. No Senate amendment goes through unless agreed to by the House.

Mr. SISSON. But frequently we have to agree to an amendment by compulsion.

Mr. MANN. Oh, do not try to work that on me and say that, having an item in one bill, the Senate insists that the House yield and put the same item in another bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain this.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need to explain it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find that the provision in the legislative bill applies to that particular bill, whereas in the sundry civil bill it applies to the appropriations carried in that bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be able to sneak something in through the Senate in the sundry civil appropriation. The gentleman wants to involve the Government further upon the subject. The supply committee ought to buy the typewriters.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure that the gentleman does not mean to say that the Committee on Appropriations was trying to slip anything through either this body or the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; certainly not. Having done that thing so frequently myself in connection with the Committee on Appropriations, I will absolve them from doing anything improper.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure that, since the gentleman states that he has been particeps criminis——

Mr. MANN. Yes; in doing good things.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure he does not intend otherwise than to pay the committee a compliment.

Mr. MANN. Very frequently it becomes necessary to do good things and not too widely to advertise them in advance.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MANN. The point of order is so plain that it does not require discussion. Of course, the gentleman can easily bring his amendment within the scope of the rule of limitations.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the point of order should be insisted upon, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

As a substitute for section 4 insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That appropriations in this act shall not be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the purchase of any typewriting machine at a price in excess of the lowest price paid by the Government of the United States for the same make and substantially the same model of machine during the fiscal year 1915; such price shall include the value of any typewriting machine or machines given in exchange, but shall not apply to special prices granted on typewriting machines used in schools of the District of Columbia or of the Indian Service, the lowest of which special prices paid for typewriting machines shall not be exceeded in future purchases for such schools: Provided, That in construing this section the Commissioner of Patents shall advise the Comptroller of the Treasury as to whether the changes in any typewriter are of such structural character as to constitute a new machine not within the limitations of this section."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. It provides that certain duties shall be exercised by the Commissioner of Patents, entirely apart from any question of limitations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee upon that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is a limitation upon the appropriations carried in the bill, and, so far as the provisions with reference to the Commissioner of Patents are concerned, it simply provides that he shall perform certain duties in connection with this particular appropriation. It is clearly a limitation imposing no duties on the Commissioner of Patents that are not connected with the appropriations in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, without taking time to cite specifically the precedents, recognizes the proposition that a limitation can be placed on an appropriation bill, but the rulings of the House are that the limitation, when fairly construed, shall not be such as to interfere with any executive discretion or to require any affirmative act on the part of any of the Government officials. In the amendment in question, the proviso, the Chair thinks, falls within one of these classes, and part of the amendment being subject to a point of order, the whole amendment is tainted, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I desire to again offer the amendment, eliminating the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

As a substitute for section 4, insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That appropriations in this act shall not be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the purchase of any typewriting machine at a price in excess of the lowest price paid by the Government of the United States for the same make and substantially the same model of machine during the fiscal year 1915; such price shall include the value of any typewriting machine or machines given in exchange, but shall not apply to special prices granted on typewriting machines used in schools of the District of Columbia or of the Indian Service, the lowest of which special prices paid for typewriting machines shall not be exceeded in future purchases for such schools."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while that is still subject to the point of order, I will not make the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KEATING offers the following as a new section:

"SEC. 5. That the appropriations herein made shall not be available for the compensation of any administrative officer who shall, after the passage of this act, demote or dismiss or cause the demotion or dismissal of any employee in the classified civil service of the United States without giving said employee an opportunity for an oral hearing with privilege of counsel and witnesses, and the right to appeal from the decision of said administrative officer by filing with the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation or its accredited representatives a written statement or by appearing in person. At the hearing before the Board of Mediation and Conciliation the employee shall have the right to have counsel, and witnesses shall be sworn and the testimony recorded: Provided, That the appeal to the board must be taken within 30 days following the demotion, suspension, or dismissal.

"The board shall have the power to appoint investigators to take testimony to be used in deciding appeals coming before it and to issue commissions for the taking of such testimony. This testimony shall be taken in the county where the witness resides, when the same can be conveniently done.

"The board and its appointed investigators shall have the power to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any Government official or employee to produce books or papers relating to any appeal under investigation.

"The board shall have the power to restore the salary, remove the suspension, or order the reinstatement when a hearing or investigation prove the demotion, suspension, or dismissal of any employee in the Federal classified civil service to have been unjustified or unlawful. It shall have the power to review any decision of a Federal department official which affects the salary or promotion of a classified civil-service employee, and may affirm, modify, or reverse the same, and remand the case with such orders as may seem to it proper in the premises, and the judgment and decrees shall be final."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Colorado on the point of order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman on what he bases his point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman from Colorado that I base it upon the ruling just made by the Chair upon a previous amendment. It undertakes to interfere with the legislative discretion and powers of the heads of the departments. It is clearly legislation and as a limitation is subject to the objection just stated by the Chair. I am personally in favor of some legislation of this kind, but think it should come by way of regular legislation when it can be considered. This was never considered or brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, it seems a good deal like carrying coals to Newcastle to discuss a question of this kind with the present occupant of the chair, but I would like to call the Chair's attention to the following case to be found in Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, at page 655:

The House may provide that no part of an appropriation shall be used in a certain way, even though executive discretion be thereby negatively restricted.

The law provides that—

No person in the classified civil service of the United States shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of said service and for reasons given in writing, and that the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of the same, and of any charges preferred against him and be furnished with a copy thereof and also be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing, and affidavits in support thereof, but that no examination of witnesses nor any trial or hearing shall be required except in the discretion of the officer making the removal.

With this amendment I seek to establish a court of appeals for the civil-service employees of the Government and to provide that no part of the appropriations in this bill shall go to pay the salary of an officer who dismisses a civil-service employee without giving him the right of hearing, a right which is in the discretion of the departmental official.

On that I want to again call the chairman's attention to this precedent, to be found on page 655, volume 4, of Hinds' Precedents, section 3968:

On February 27, 1905, the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the paragraph providing for the construction of a public building in Cleveland was reached, and Mr. Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, offered this amendment:

"Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used in the construction of the exterior or outer walls of a material other than granite."

Mr. James A. Hemingway, of Indiana, made the point of order that the amendment would change existing law. Mr. Hemingway said:

"Mr. Chairman, the law authorizing the construction of this building provides that it is to be constructed of material selected under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the Tarsney Act, as the building material is always selected by the Secretary of the Treasury. In fact, I have no recollection of any public building bill ever passing that did not provide this. Now, here a bill has passed which provides that the section of the material shall be under this law. The Secretary of the Treasury has taken action. I understand the contract has been let."

It was shown in that discussion that the law vested the Secretary of the Treasury with absolute discretion in the matter of selecting the material of which public buildings should be constructed, and therefore it was held by those who opposed the amendment proposed by Mr. Burton that the point of order should be sustained. To make that point perfectly clear let me read the colloquy that occurred between Mr. Burton and Mr. Grosvenor, of Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman not aware that there is a plain option outstanding between the two kinds of material?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Secretary has the right to exercise that option.

Mr. BURTON. Under the contract.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If this bill is passed, is that right left to him?

Mr. BURTON. It is not.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union sustained the point of order, and Mr. Burton, one of the most distinguished Members who ever sat in this Chamber, took an appeal to the House, and by a vote of 65 to 89 the ruling of the Chair was reversed and the amendment was admitted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold these precedents fully sustain the amendment which I have offered and bring it within the rule which permits us to place a limitation upon appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair recognizes that Mr. Burton, whom the gentleman cited, was a very able Member of this House, and the Chair also desires to state that the Chairman who overruled the point of order was the late Vice President Sherman, also one of the best presiding officers this House has ever had. The Chair, on the same proposition, cites section 3973 of Hinds' Precedents:

While a limitation may provide that no part of an appropriation shall be used except in a certain way, yet the restriction of executive discretion may not go to the extent of an imposition of new duties.

And to the following section, 3974, which provides:

It has generally been held that provisions giving a new construction of law or limiting the discretion which has been exercised by officers charged with the duties of administration changes the law within the meaning of the rule.

And are not in order.

Now, the gentleman from Colorado, the proponent of the amendment, stated in his argument to the Chair that he sought to amend the present law by providing a court of appeals. Clearly that is not simply a limitation, and the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment proposed by Mr. KEATING as a new section:

"SEC. 5. That appropriations herein made shall not be available for the compensation of any administrative officer who shall, after the passage of this act, demote or dismiss, or cause the demotion or dismissal, of any employee in the classified civil service of the United States without giving said employee an opportunity for an oral hearing with the privilege of counsel and witnesses."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that amendment on the same grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My point of order is that, while the amendment is in the form of a limitation, it seems to me it undertakes to interfere with the discretion and authority of the heads of the departments and changes the present civil-service law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman a question. Is or is not the provision that of the present law in the case which the gentleman from Colorado a moment ago read in relation to the removal of employees? Does that amendment change that law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I remember the amendment, it does change the law, in that it provides something for counsel for employees——

Mr. GOOD. The provision for witnesses in the present law permits witnesses and oral testimony with the consent of the official who has dismissed the employee.

Mr. KEATING. I will say to the Chair that the present law vests in the official who dismisses an employee the right to grant or refuse a hearing. It is a matter of official discretion, and I submit to the Chair that under the decision which I read just a moment ago this amendment comes clearly within the rule placing a limitation upon appropriation bills.

As a matter of fact, it is difficult to conceive of a limitation which could be placed upon an appropriation bill which does not to a greater or less extent change existing law. I call the attention of the Chairman to a case illustrating the point, one with which the Chair is no doubt familiar. This is to be found in the RECORD of February 21, 1911, and is the case where Mr. HUGHES, of New Jersey, now Senator from that State, offered his famous amendment relating to the eight-hour workday for all employees, laborers and mechanics, engaged or to be engaged in the construction of vessels named therein. Now, the Hughes amendment provided:

That no part of the appropriation shall be expended for the construction of any boat by any person, firm, or corporation which has not at the time of the commencement of construction of such vessel established an eight-hour workday for all employees, laborers, and mechanics engaged or to be engaged in the construction of vessels named herein.

The law provided that the Secretary of the Treasury must award the contracts for building these ships to the lowest responsible bidder. Mr. Hughes attempted, by placing a limitation on the appropriation bill, to change existing law so the Secretary of the Treasury could not award a contract to a man who worked his employees more than eight hours a day.

And in that case the Chair ruled the amendment out on a point of order, when Mr. Hughes appealed to the House and the House overruled the decision of the Chair and sustained the amendment.

And I submit to the Chair that where a precedent has been established by the House it is entitled to more consideration by the occupant of the chair than a precedent which may have been established by a former Chairman. The precedent which I cited in the first instance was established by this House, not by any occupant of the chair, after a full discussion and a vote thereon, and this Hughes amendment was sustained in the same way. I submit to the Chair that the amendment which I have sent to the desk is clearly within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair recognizes the force of the argument of the able gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the Chair will go outside and state that it sometimes happens in the heat of debate on political questions at issue this House has overruled presiding officers and then subsequently has overruled that action, agreeing that the presiding officer that they overruled was correct at first. The Chair has absolutely no pride of opinion, but the Chair believes that under the rules and precedents of the House this amendment is an interference with legislative discretion and, therefore, subject to the point of order. But the Chair will be delighted to entertain an appeal from his decision and submit the matter to the committee, if anyone desires to appeal. [After a pause.] The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 5. That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] on the point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I will state that that is the existing law now as contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of 1912, and is not, I take it, subject to a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If it is existing law there is no necessity for the amendment.

Mr. DYER. It is the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. He says it is contained in the legislative bill. Was it for that year or was it made permanent law?

Mr. DYER. My understanding is that it is permanent law. And I will say to the chairman that I do not believe any serious attention is being paid to it by the departments, and I think it is a good idea to rewrite it in the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has before him the legislative act of 1912, and it is not permanent law. That provision says:

That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments, no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped, or reduced in rank or salary.

The Chair is of the opinion that that is simply law for the year 1912, and is not permanent law, and that the amendment in question changes the existing law. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That persons in the classified service, appropriated for and employed in any of the executive departments or other Government establishments at Washington, D. C., shall not be detailed hereafter for service outside of the District of Columbia except for or in connection with work pertaining directly to the service, at the seat of government, of the department or other Government establishment from which the detail is made; such exceptional details may be for periods not exceeding 30 days at any one time, and may be renewed for additional periods of 30 days only on the written authority of the head of such department or Government establishment, and persons so detailed and while engaged under such detail shall be entitled to no greater salary than that provided for the position held at the time the detail is made: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prohibit the employment, away from the District of Columbia, as now authorized, of special agents, inspectors, examiners, or other like employees appropriated for in the executive departments or other Government establishment whose regular duties require frequent or constant absence from the seat of government or of persons employed under general appropriations for field service: Provided further, That any person in the classified service of any executive department or other Government establishment at the seat of government who resigns and is employed, under a general or lump-sum appropriation, in field service outside the District of Columbia shall not be paid a salary in excess of that being received at the time of resignation.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the section. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to give the committee some idea of the comprehensiveness of this section and what it is intended to cover and what it will cover.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This provision was inserted in the bill in order to correct a custom that seems to have grown up in some few cases very recently, of permitting persons in the classified service to resign for a certain length of time and then putting them on a special roll and sending them into the field at a greatly increased salary, and then after their work in the field has been completed, permitting them to come back into the departments and again assume the position which they formerly held.

There were one or two instances brought to the attention of the committee, or which developed in the hearings, in which it appeared that several employees here in the departments had been permitted to follow this course and had been placed upon a special salary roll while temporarily in the field considerably in excess of what they would have drawn if they had been sent upon this duty at their regular salary. I will read, in part, a letter addressed to the chairman of the committee by the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

During the fiscal year 1915 and 1916, persons resigning their statutory positions in this bureau and being reappointed on the said Indian roll were the following:

John McPhaul, chief law clerk of this office, at $2,500 per annum, appointed superintendent of opening and sale of Indian reservations at $20 per day, when outside of the District of Columbia, with transportation and sleeping-car expenses, but with no allowance for subsistence or per diem in lieu thereof, and $7 per day when employed in the District of Columbia.

C. G. Fisher, clerk in this office, at $1,400 per annum, appointed assistant superintendent at a salary of $7.50 per day and actual subsistence not exceeding $2 per day during the year 1915, and during the year 1916, $7 per day, with not exceeding $3 per day for subsistence.

George J. Drewry, a clerk in this office, at $1,600 per annum, appointed assistant superintendent at $7 per day and actual subsistence not exceeding $3 per day.

Under the above appointments Mr. McPhaul was employed 5½ months during the fiscal year 1915 and 6 months and 29 days during the fiscal year 1916, during which periods he received a total of $3,710.73 in excess of what he would have received as chief law clerk of this office, making no allowance for subsistence and other extraordinary personal expenses to which the Superintendent of Opening Indian Reservations is necessarily subjected, but for which no reimbursement is allowed.

Mr. Fisher was employed on the Indian roll a total period of 7 11/30 months, for which he received a total of $708.45 in excess of what he would have received as clerk in this office at $1,400, giving no consideration to the amount paid him to cover the cost of subsistence under his appointment.

Mr. Drewry was employed on the Indian roll a total period of 4 months and 10 days, for which he received a total of $353.23 in excess of what he would have received as clerk in this office at $1,600 per annum, disregarding the amount paid him to cover cost of subsistence under his appointment.

Now, I submit, gentlemen, that is not—I will not say illegal, in one sense—but in another sense it is not fair to this Government; and it is not proper for those employed in the classified service to be permitted to resign temporarily and then, as in one of these cases, to be appointed and sent out in the field at $20 a day, with his position held open here for him in the department, and then, when his services are concluded there, to be permitted to come back here and take his position at the regular salary.

Now, that is not all. It developed in the course of the hearings that there was detailed from the State Department to the London Embassy a clerk upon the $1,600 roll to put in a certain record system and his expenses paid across the ocean and his subsistence paid while in London; although, I think, he was kept there at the same salary that he would have drawn here. In another case a lady employed in the State Department when the war broke out unfortunately found herself in Belgium and unable to return here, and since that time she has been employed in the embassy at Brussels, possibly at the same salary, although she is on the permanent roll here. Now, I am not finding fault with those who ordered these details. They were no doubt actuated by the necessity of having this work done. I do not want to be understood as questioning the motives or the necessity of such details. But I submit that it was contrary to law, and if continued then Congress will never be able to determine as to what number of clerks are required for work in Washington or as to how its appropriations for that specific purpose are expended.

In addition to that there was a detail of a stenographer from the permanent roll of the Treasurer's office to the office of the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco. Congress had made the appropriations for the service of those employees here in this district, here in the city of Washington, and I submit that if we are to have this sort of transfer from the city of Washington to other points in the country, and even across the ocean, it will be impossible for Congress to keep up with the appropriations.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I sympathize with the gentleman's proposition in reference to the matter about which he has been talking, and it does seem that a vicious practice is about to grow up. But I wish to call the gentleman's attention to my own particular interest in this matter, and it is this: You prohibit certain employees whose work is here in Washington from being detailed to work in the field for 30 days except under certain conditions, and then, in your proviso, you provide that "this section shall not be construed to prohibit the employment, away from the District of Columbia, as now authorized, of special agents, inspectors, examiners, or other like employees appropriated for in the executive or other Government establishments," and so on.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to this situation in the Department of Agriculture. The Forest Service has, I think, seven district stations from which the supervisory work of that district is conducted. At each of these stations there is located an employee of the solicitor's office of the Department of Agriculture. That employee—that lawyer—is under the direct control of the solicitor. Now, the point I have in mind is whether or not this section would prohibit that kind of a situation existing. If so, it ought to be amended in such a way as to provide for that class of employees. Otherwise, you would practically break up that service. It is an absolutely necessary service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I do not see how this would interfere with that sort of situation.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will make a point of order against the provision. It is evident that this matter has not been properly gone into.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not fair to the committee to say that it has not been properly considered. It was considered very carefully and very seriously by the committee.

Mr. CARLIN. Here is a condition that was not considered. Here——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is in sympathy with the provision.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I am in sympathy with the provision, but I have referred to a situation which I thought ought to be remedied.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had made a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved against the paragraph. Does the gentleman from Virginia make a point of order?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if he heard the statement which I made concerning a law clerk in the General Land Office being permitted to resign ad interim and draw, in a period of 11 months, $3,710.73 more than he would have received if he had been on a regular salary, and after that being permitted to come back to his old position and retain it at his former salary.

Mr. CARLIN. Does the gentleman think the provision would meet that sort of a case?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Then I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the sort of case that has given rise to this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] reserve his point of order on the amendment?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will accept an amendment which I will propose, I will not make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from South Carolina need not scruple about that. I am going to make a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not persist in that determination.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] ought to stand by his guns. I always want to protect Government officials.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This provision will not, if the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, do any harm or injustice to employees of the Department of Agriculture or any other department. It especially provides that employees may be detailed for business connected with the departments, but it does provide that they shall not be given $20 a day and these other excess sums over and above their regular salaries.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have read this paragraph very carefully a number of times, and I do not know just what it means. I do not think anybody else does. I do not believe in trying to overturn the Government service and the methods which have been followed in the Government service without very careful consideration, something which this paragraph has not received and will not receive here. Doubtless there are some abuses which ought to be corrected, but this is not the manner in which to get at it.

The gentleman says that somebody has gone out of the service temporarily and received higher pay. That is very likely.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not only one, but quite a number, as has been developed in the hearings and as I read to the House a moment ago.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Very likely that is the case, and almost certainly, if the Government had not employed those people to take special care of something which required special consideration in addition to the ordinary work of the Government employee, it would have employed somebody else on the outside at a very much higher rate of pay.

Most of these cases that arise have been in connection with legal work. The Government frequently has employed somebody who has left some office in connection with legal work for the Government and has paid him a higher salary outside. Where it has not done that, and where they have not had special knowledge, the Government has employed somebody outside who knew nothing about it, and paid that somebody twice the salary that it would have paid to somebody connected with the Government service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This provision does not undertake to prevent the detail of any employee, but simply provides that he shall not be detailed at an excess of salary. It does not permit him to resign in order to be appointed to another position at a per diem of $20 a day, as was the case in one instance, and then come back and resume his former position.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean to ask me to yield to tell me what is contained in the section? I know what is in the section. I am aware of that. But it is also true that you can not detail one of the employees of the Government on special work and ask him to work day and night upon some question week in and week out, as frequently happens, for the ordinary pay. You put a lawyer upon a case of great importance and nothing else goes into his mind; he is thoroughly absorbed; he does work which no ordinary person does for ordinary pay. That is what the Government does sometimes, and it is done properly and to advantage. You put some man upon special work and pay him specially for it, and say to him that you want him to go to the bottom of it. If he is paid according to the work he does, he will do that work, and he will do it well, and he will do it more cheaply, whether he be a lawyer or a man of science, than somebody outside will do it for. I do not believe that the Government ought to lay down such hard and fast rules. The way to have proper government is to have men in charge who will run the Government properly. It can not be done by legislation. To say that men shall be employed or dismissed only under certain conditions is to destroy the real efficiency of government and try to control appointments by legislation. That is the duty of the Executive, not of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter stricken out insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That in expending the appropriations made in this act persons in the classified service at Washington, D. C., shall not be detailed for service outside of the District of Columbia except for or in connection with work pertaining directly to the service at the seat of government of the department or other Government establishment from which the detail is made."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not make a point of order against this amendment. I am quite willing that they should try this experiment with the departments in Washington. If it works well, all right. I am very sure that it will not be a year before they will want to modify this; but it is not destructive, because the places where these things are usually done are not carried in this appropriation bill at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the provisions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1899, approved March 15, 1898, and amendments thereto, requiring not less than seven hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order, of all clerks and other employees in the several executive departments, is amended so as to provide that the heads of the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia shall hereafter require, subject to the provisions and exceptions of said section 7 and amendments thereof, of all clerks and other employees of whatever grades or class in such executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia not less than eight hours of labor each day except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this paragraph is not in order, because it proposes a change of existing law which does not come within the exceptions to the prohibition contained in the second paragraph of Rule XXI.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment under consideration is not in order because of the fact that it contemplates a change of existing law and does not come within the purview of the exceptions to the rule that no provision changing existing law shall be in order on an appropriation bill, contained in the second paragraph of Rule XXI, found on page 361 of the House Manual of the Sixty-third Congress, third session.

The exceptions to the general rule prohibiting a change of existing law on an appropriation bill, contained in the paragraph referred to, are divided into two classes on the basis of the source, origin, and manner of presentation, the exceptions contained in the body of the paragraph being such as operate without regard to the manner of the presentation of the proposal, while those contained in the proviso apply only to amendments offered through certain designated legislative channels.

I shall first refer briefly to the first class of exceptions. In the first place, the amendment must be germane to the subject matter of the bill. I have serious doubts of the amendment in question being germane to the subject matter of the bill, but do not care to take the time of the committee in discussing that point at this time. The rule further provides that the amendment, to come within the exceptions to the general rule—

Shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Here are three separate propositions. I shall take them up in order.

The first question is, Would this amendment, if it was adopted, retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States? It seems to me very clear that nothing of the kind is accomplished or even proposed by the amendment. It may be urged that the adoption of the amendment and its incorporation in permanent law would eventually result in the reduction of the number of officers and clerks; but such a contention would have no better basis than mere speculation or highly optimistic expectation or hope, and it has been repeatedly held that an amendment can not be brought within the scope of the exceptions to the general rule of prohibition by mere speculation or opinions based on hope rather than reason or logic. Clearly the adoption of the amendment would not result in the reduction of the salary of the officers of the United States. Nothing of the kind is provided for, and I am sure the proponents of the amendment would not urge that a reduction of the actual salaries paid was even remotely contemplated.

The second proposition of this provision of the rule is that an amendment, to be accepted as an exception to the general rule of prohibition of new legislation, shall result in "the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States."

The word "compensation" is undoubtedly used in this connection to denote payments made for the performance of a certain specific task or undertaking—such, for instance, as the payment under contract or agreement for the carrying of the mails on a star route. It might be claimed to apply to compensation for day labor, though it is doubtful if it was so intended. In any event, however, the amendment would not result in the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

There still remains to be considered the third exception contained in this portion of the rule, to wit: "The reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill." Clearly and beyond question no such reduction is attempted or accomplished.

This brief analysis would seem to make it very clear that the amendment proposed does not come within any of the exceptions contained in the body of the paragraph under consideration, which relieve amendments from the operation of the general rule of prohibition against change of existing law.

We now come to the proviso, which is as follows:

That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law, or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

This proviso is important in that it restricts amendments to those presented through certain legislative channels. It does, however, provide that the amendment must be germane to the subject matter of the bill.

As I said a moment ago, I do not propose to discuss that question now, though I think it very doubtful if the amendment is germane. The proviso makes in order germane amendments presented in the proper legislative way which retrench expenditures. It will, of course, be contended that the adoption of this amendment would retrench expenditures. No such result would necessarily follow from its adoption; such a result could only follow providing the clerks performed a considerably increased amount of work by the lengthening of the hours of labor, and that this increased amount of work performed by each clerk would result in the reduction of the number of clerks employed. Whether or no this would be the result of the passage of the amendment, no one can tell; it is merely a matter of opinion. Assuming that it might be possible, many would contend that it was not probable, and no one could properly claim that it was certain. It is all a matter of speculation and conjecture, and it has been held repeatedly that a provision can not be brought within this proviso by mere hopeful expectation, speculation, or conjecture.

So far I have discussed features of this matter with regard to which it must be admitted there is some ground for difference of opinion, but we now reach a feature of the subject with regard to which there can be, in my opinion, no reasonable ground for a difference of opinion. I refer to the question of jurisdiction. An amendment, to come within the purview of the proviso to paragraph 2 of Rule XXI, must be presented "upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment."

The committee on appropriations does not have jurisdiction of the subject matter of such an amendment as that presented, which is the status of Government officers, clerks, and employees. Paragraph 3 of Rule XI, page 293, defines the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations to "subjects relating to the appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government" along certain lines. Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents, Volume IV, paragraph 4033, which is quoted on page 293 of the Rules of the House, holds—

While this committee has authority to report appropriations, the power to report legislation relating thereto belongs to other committees.

The committee which has jurisdiction of such an amendment as is proposed is the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, which, according to the rules, paragraph 706, has jurisdiction over the status of officers, clerks, and employees of the civil branches of the Government (Hinds, IV, 4297). That committee has reported many bills relating to the status of officers and clerks. As rulings directly in point, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to sections 944 and 944a of the Digest. The ruling under paragraph 944 was by Chairman GARRETT, and was delivered on January 16, 1912. After discussing the rule at some length, Chairman GARRETT said:

The Chair is of the opinion that the Committee on Appropriations may not, under the rule, bring in as an integral part of an appropriation bill substantive legislation that, if introduced in the ordinary way in the House—that is, by a bill or joint resolution—would go to another standing committee for consideration and action.

The ruling under paragraph 944a was by Chairman HULL on December 20, 1913. The amendment in question was on the District appropriation bill and provided a system of assessments against abutting property holders for street improvement. Chairman HULL held that as this was a provision changing existing law, the Committee on Appropriations having no jurisdiction over the subject matter, the amendment was subject to a point of order. It seems to me very clear, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment does not meet any of the tests of paragraph 2 of section 21 of the rules, and that, therefore, it is subject to the point of order that it changes existing law, and therefore has no place on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, as the Chair is well aware, the Holman rule, which we may say is the only rule that would permit legislation on an appropriation bill, contains two provisions. The original provision of the Holman rule contemplated an amendment in the form of legislation retrenching expenses in one of three ways, either by reduction in the number of officers of the United States, reduction in the salaries of officers of the United States, or reduction in the amount carried in the bill. The proviso in the Holman rule goes a little further and is a little broader in providing that it shall also be in order by a report from committee to attach legislation to an appropriation bill that tends to retrench expenses.

Now, it may be conceded, for the purposes of this debate, that the Appropriation Committee is not a legislation committee, and therefore a provision of legislation attached to an appropriation bill coming from the Appropriation Committee has no more standing under the point of order than a provision offered by a Member from his place on the floor. The gentleman from Wyoming and myself are at no disagreement on that particular proposition.

The proposition, then, is whether section 6 of the present bill operates as a retrenchment, and is in order under the main provision of the Holman rule. It has been held by distinguished chairmen who have occupied the position of Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, as well as by the Speaker of the House, that the Holman rule is a remedial rule which must have a liberal and effective construction. In other words, there has been a distinct refusal on the part of Chairmen to fritter away the Holman rule by refinements of test, a thing the Chair will see might easily be attained. By refinement of technicalities the virtues of the Holman rule might be dissipated, and we might so limit the operation that the very purpose in adopting it might be defeated. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the Holman rule may be given a liberal interpretation. It has been said to properly appreciate whether an amendment comes within the Holman rule we must look at existing law as well as at the proposed amendment. Under that interpretation of the rule the provision that the Government shall obtain a full day's work of eight hours, instead of less time, from those employed is distinctly and unqualifiedly a retrenchment. Any business man would so regard it. There is no doubt that if the Government obtained a full day's work from its employees in place of a lesser day's work either that more work will be done by the employees prima facie, and therefore the work will be made more current and up to date or that a smaller number of employees will do a certain amount of work. This bill carries a number of provisions for the employment of special and temporary employees. There are several provisions in the bill for temporary employees. These temporary employees are paid out of a lump sum or otherwise provided for in the bill. It is perfectly manifest that if the regular employees do a full day's work the necessity for temporary employees to that extent will diminish.

As has been stated by Chairman SAUNDERS when he occupied the chair in Committee of the Whole, the Chairman must be guided by his ordinary observation of the conduct of business. At that time an amendment was presented, which is shown in section 945 of the Digest, and a point of order was made to it on the ground that it did not come within the Holman rule. Chairman SAUNDERS in discussing the rule referred to a previous decision by Speaker Kerr and Chairman Wilson, of the Committee of the Whole, on some provision of the rule. The decision of Speaker Kerr was on an amendment presented by my former colleague, Mr. De Armond, providing an exception in the pension bill. I want to call the Chairman's particular attention to this, because it meets a great many of the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. Mr. De Armond proposed an amendment excepting a certain person from the operation of the bill. It did not appear and could not appear that any of these persons would apply for pensions, that they had applied for pensions, or that they would apply during the next few years. The point was made there as here, that it did not reduce in terms the amount carried in the bill, nor did it reduce the number of officers of the United States, nor the compensation of any officer of the United States. Speaker Kerr said:

> The effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. De Armond, was to increase the number of persons prohibited from the benefits of a particular clause of the pension law, thereby reducing the number of pensioners as a necessary sequence. A reduction in the number of pensioners carried with it a reduction of the amount that would be paid out for pensions under the general head of pension appropriation. The De Armond amendment was held to be in order. It will be noted that this amendment was not directed to the amount of money actually appropriated by the bill. In terms it did not reduce the aggregate amount specifically carried for the payment of pensions. But the Chair was justified in concluding—certainly it so concluded—that in the execution of the pension laws the amount otherwise required for the purposes of pensions would be reduced by the De Armond amendment.

And so here it is not necessary to demonstrate mathematically and show the amount of money carried in the bill is reduced. It is necessary only to say from a common-sense standpoint that the necessary effect of the amendment must be such a retrenchment.

Further on Chairman SAUNDERS, in his opinion, said:

> The Chair is not unmindful of the proviso in the second section of Rule XXI, but whatever meaning may be given to the proviso it should not be construed to take away powers definitely given by the preceding paragraph.

The rule says there shall also be in order certain amendments offered by a committee, but a construction of the proviso can not cut down the express powers given by the main portion of the rule itself.

Then further on he says:

> But it is not necessary for this conclusion or reduction to be established with the rigor and severity of a mathematical demonstration. It is enough if the amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, will fairly operate by its own force to retrench expenditures in one of the three ways indicated.

The particular provision that was before the House at that time was a provision to reduce the number of regiments of the United States from 15 to 10. That was the amendment which was being passed upon by the Chairman, Mr. SAUNDERS. He points out in his opinion that nowhere in the bill is there any provision for reducing the amount carried in the bill, nor even for reducing the number of officers of the United States Army, which was the express provision under consideration, but he says that it is necessarily true that 10 regiments will cost less in the aggregate for their upkeep than 15 regiments. It is not necessary for that to appear in the amendment itself, and so I say here that given a certain amount of Government work to be performed, much of it in arrears, much of it done by temporary employees called in from time to time as occasion may determine, to say that the men regularly employed upon the roll shall work eight hours for a full day instead of a partial day prima facie manifestly shows that there will be a reduction in the special work done by the special employees and paid for out of the lump sums of the bill. Not only that, but the work under consideration by the departments will be kept nearer up to date and consequently it will take less time, and therefore less expenditure, in bringing the work of the Government up to its current point.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to suggest that the gentleman from Missouri is not discussing the point of order, but the merits of the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, I think I am discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman was discussing the point of order, and the Chair was giving him undivided attention.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I think I am discussing the point of order when I point out what would be the reasonable, approximate, and natural effects of the bill.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not feel that I ought at this time to discuss the merits as to the policy of Congress adopting this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Is the gentleman not assuming that every day's work done for the Government is a seven-hour day? Is the gentleman not taking it for granted that the Chair must assume as a question of fact upon this point of order that seven hours of work is done by every employee, and no more than seven hours? For all that the committee knows, the employee may work eight hours or more than eight hours. Is the gentleman not assuming that the minimum now provided—seven hours—is lived up to exactly, and that no one works more than that?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the Chair must take into consideration the existing law on the subject. If there is any rule, regulation, or other provision having the force of law, of course it can be called to the attention of the Chair; but I will firmly defy the gentleman from Kansas to point to a single Executive order having the force of law which now exists in the departments extending the time beyond seven hours. But the Chair looks upon the law as it stands, which is that there are seven hours' work done in a day. It looks upon the proposed amendment, which provides that there shall not be less than eight hours' work done in a day. Upon that he must make up his mind whether that will dispense with services of certain special employees as a necessary result; whether it will accomplish more units of work within the business day, and thereby accomplish more work for the same expenditure of Government money. Both of those matters are matters of retrenchment. If the gentleman was running a factory and he had a number of employees working for him on a seven-hour day and they turned out a given output, and he determined to retrench and concluded that he would have a certain number of employees working eight hours, he would class that as a retrenchment, and would so represent it, probably, to his stockholders that employed him as manager; and so, I say, it is a mere matter of deduction.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Is it not a fact that in Judge SAUNDERS's decision he stated that in determining whether there was a retrenchment the Chair would not be confined to the act under consideration, but must take into consideration all circumstances and the law of the land in general instead of the one bill?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is true. I was looking for that provision in his decision. Chairman SAUNDERS says in this decision which is quoted:

> It is true that, having reference to the difference of minds, one Chairman might hold that retrenchment would be the necessary result of an amendment, while another Chairman of the committee on appeal might be of a different opinion. But this is inevitable. The law is clear, for instance, that at times a court upon the facts can hold as a matter of law that there was no negligence. Still upon the same facts one court will derive this conclusion, while another court on appeal will reach a different conclusion. The ruling of the Chair on these points is subject to appeal to the committee.
> What does this amendment propose to do? The present law provides for an establishment of 15 Cavalry regiments. The proposed amendment limits the number of Cavalry regiments to 10. It is difficult for the Chair, by any fair process of reasoning, having reference to known facts, and the relative proportion between the branches of the Army, to see how 15 regiments of Cavalry can be maintained as cheaply as 10, or that a reduction of the Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10 will not effect a reduction in the amount which would be otherwise expended on this branch of the Army under existing law.

So that under the provisions, as I take it, of the main section—section 2 of the Holman rule—this provision would be in order. It would be in order as a reduction of the number of persons employed for the work of the United States.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, the last words of the gentleman before he took his seat were to the effect that he believed that the amendment was in order, because it would result in a reduction of the number of employees in the Government service.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has raised the point of order, has given it as his opinion that the adoption of this amendment would not result in a reduction of the number of employees. Neither of the gentlemen has produced any substantial evidence to back his opinion. I do not propose to enter into any lengthy discussion of the point of order, because, in my judgment, it has been well supported by the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] believes that the Chair should be liberal in his interpretation of the Holman rule. If the Chair were to decide that this amendment was in order, he would have to be so liberal as to forget absolutely that the Holman rule was ever written. Now, the gentleman from Missouri again says, and repeatedly said it in his argument, that the adoption of this amendment would certainly result in a retrenchment of expenses and a necessary reduction in the number of employees. Mr. Chairman, I made it my business to go to the men in Washington who can give information on this point, the chief clerks in the various departments who have charge of the personnel in the different departments in which they are working, and I have here a number of opinions from those men who distribute the work to those under them, and for the information of the committee I would like to read just a few of these opinions from the chief clerks, covering the question as to whether or not the adoption of an eight-hour workday would result in a reduction of the number of Government employees.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just a minute?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the opinions of chief clerks or others are not germane, and the gentleman is not discussing the point of order. The point of order can not be determined by referring to an undetermined number of gentlemen for their opinion as to what the probable effect is, and I submit to the gentleman that his opinions or alleged opinions are discussing the merits of the bill rather than the point of order. Now, as a matter of fact, none of that stuff which the gentleman has there was ever put in the hearings, and the gentleman admits, I take it, that not a word appears in the hearings.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I would say here is a volume of over 1,100 pages of a report of the hearings and not a single thing about this amendment of the gentleman is in that volume——

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Well, I am willing to be shown by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will indulge the Chair, the Chair always understood a point of order was addressed to the Chair for the Chair to determine, and the Chair would ask the gentlemen while this point of order is up to confine their remarks to it, and the Chair does not think that a colloquy between Members on an outside matter is likely to elucidate or help the Chair in determining the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the opinions which the gentleman from Massachusetts has offered to read are not pertinent to the discussion of the point of order and are not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see how opinions of chief clerks would elucidate the point of order.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I was answering the gentleman's own argument, to which no one took exception. His argument was to the effect that his amendment did provide for a reduction in the number of employees. He gave his opinion. I am giving as my authority for my opinion the men who ought to know.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will indulge the Chair, it seems to the Chair that it is for the Chair to construe the amendment and see whether that amendment provides for a reduction, and the Chair in ruling has to pass on what the Chair believes the amendment shows, without the opinion of somebody else, as to whether it does or does not.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. Does the Chair mean by that ruling to hold that it must appear affirmatively from the record itself——

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair will rule on the point of order when he reaches it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman cites the distinguished Member from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] as his authority. My recollection is Judge SAUNDERS decided that the provision must have the necessary force of reducing expenditures, and in my judgment the gentleman's amendment does not show that, and in nothing that he has said has he shown it, and my letters will show that it has not the necessary force of reducing expenditures, and for that reason I thought that perhaps they ought to be considered in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair has no desire whatever to limit the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts or in any way to control the discussion legitimately of the point of order, and if the gentleman thinks that the opinion of the chief clerk of a department will aid the Chair in passing on this point of order, and the gentleman so states, the Chair will not preclude him from reading it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, having already heard from the Chair that the Chair believes it is within the province of the Chair to determine himself the fact that the amendment would produce the necessary reduction in the number of employees or a possible retrenchment, it is not the purpose of the gentleman from Massachusetts to intrude upon the Chair's mind something that the Chair is not required to accept and does not need for his assistance in determining this question. I simply want to add that, in my opinion, irrespective of the chief clerk's, but from what I have been able to gather, this amendment will not reduce expenditures. The gentleman from Missouri has not shown in anything that he has said that it will reduce expenditures, and therefore the amendment is not in order. I may ask to be heard later.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be proper for the Chair to consider upon this question anything that might be suggested to him as a reason why this amendment and its interpretation as affecting existing law was questionable. I do not know to what extent the matter submitted or offered to be submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] might have an effect on the Chairman's mind. It occurs to me that it would be proper in the consideration of this amendment to suggest to the Chair any matter that would indicate that the necessary effect of this amendment would not be such as is argued by its proponents.

Let me read to you the language of a decision with which you are doubtless familiar, but which it is proper to consider directly in connection with this case, which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session Sixty-second Congress, on page 1691:

> The reduction of expenditures must appear as a necessary result in order to bring an amendment or provision within the exception to the rule.

In considering the question as to whether or not it will be a necessary result, it seems to me the Chair would have a right to take into consideration all those known, or even suggested, facts that might aid him to form a definite conclusion. The Chair must pass upon the question as to whether the adoption of the amendment will necessarily result in a reduction of expenditures.

The language goes on, further, and says:

It is not sufficient that such reduction would probably, or would in the opinion of the Chair, result therefrom.

That is, it must not be only a probable or possible result, but a necessary result.

Now, coming to consider the provisions of the rule as applied to this particular amendment. It is provided that the requirement fixing the minimum of seven hours' labor shall be changed to one of eight hours. Now, let us see whether or not the adoption of such an amendment will necessarily result in such a diminution or retrenchment of expenditures as is contended. It must appear that it will effect a reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States. It can not be held that it will reduce the salary. It can not be held that it will necessarily reduce the number. We are inclined to jump mentally to conclusions. We perhaps think that if this amendment should be adopted, after a while and as the result, after the reorganization had been effected, it might be possible to conduct the Government with a less number of officers. But that, Mr. Chairman, is purely an argumentative conclusion. It is not a necessary conclusion. None of the other provisions could possibly apply, and the only provision that you can suggest that might apply can only be made applicable upon an inference that after a while, because those now employed will be required to work another hour, the Government may dismiss some now employed. But there may be a greater amount of work. It may be that because of longer hours employees can not work so efficiently as before. It may be that in a great number of cases seven hours of work is all that can be effectively done and that more hours of work will decrease rather than increase the volume of labor accomplished. All these are matters proper for your consideration.

And how is it possible, when it is not even inferentially stated in the terms of the amendment that a reduction of the number of employees is specified, to so hold except upon speculation and conjecture? Under all the authorities that must not be done. In the language of the authority which I read the reduction must appear as a necessary result in order to bring the amendment within the exceptions to the rule prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills. Neither a possible nor a probable reduction will bring a proposed rider within the exception. It must appear from the very terms of the amendment that if adopted it must necessarily effect a reduction.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call your attention to a statement made by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] in charge of this bill, and who reported it to the House. I asked him this question:

Does this bill provide for a reduction of the clerical forces of the various bureaus of the Government as a result of the proposed increase in the hours of labor?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill in its preparation did not take into consideration the Borland amendment or provide for any reduction that might be had, if any does occur, by reason of the possible adoption of that amendment on the part of Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then it does not mean a reduction of expenditures?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say whether it would or would not mean a reduction of expenses, if it were adopted. I can only say that this bill was prepared without contemplation on the part of the committee that such an amendment would be adopted or even considered by the House.

Mr. AUSTIN. If this Borland amendment be adopted, it does not mean the dropping of a single clerk, because this bill carries appropriations for the clerks in the departments as estimated, regardless of this proposed change in the law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does not, so far as this bill is concerned, unless the House should choose to drop them.

Since that running debate on the first day of the consideration of this bill, we have gone over this bill, page by page and line by line, and not an attempt has been made by the gentleman in charge of the bill or the author of the amendment now being considered to make a single solitary reduction in the salary of a clerk or in the clerical force of a bureau of this Government in consequence of this amendment, or to reduce any lump-sum appropriation in this bill. I also call the Chair's attention to this fact——

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. AUSTIN. Just as soon as I get through. The majority report on this bill contains this statement:

Total increase in the amount of this bill over appropriations for 1916 is $565,374.50.

So we are considering this point of order, and this bill which carries an actual increase of half a million dollars, along with this Borland rider. There is not a reduction of a single clerk or a single salary or the saving of a dollar, but, on the contrary, an increase over the previous bill, that did not carry a rider of this kind. So that in the three classes set forth in the Holman amendment the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] can not name a single instance from the beginning to the close of this bill where a clerk has been dropped, a salary reduced, or the total amount carried in the bill reduced. In fact, we have increased the total amount the bill originally carried and have added a number of additional clerks since the bill was reported to the House.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is well aware of the law to the effect that amounts not expended are covered back into the Treasury? In other words, his argument is based upon the fact that the amounts appropriated must inevitably by compulsion be expended, but that is not the law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, the gentleman from Missouri knows the head of every bureau will expend every dollar carried in this appropriation bill and perhaps ask us for a deficiency in the coming Congress. And yet the gentleman has slept here on his rights during the consideration of this bill, lasting for more than a week, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, the author of this amendment which he claims will reduce expenses, without offering a single amendment to this bill reducing the clerical force in a single bureau of this Government.

Had he intended to make his claim good, Mr. Chairman, he would have followed up the adoption of his amendment in the closing hours of the consideration of this bill in the Committee on Appropriations, where it was incorporated in the bill without a hearing and without consideration, by offering amendments here to reduce the force. And when discussing this bill in general debate he was asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] how many clerks this amendment, if put into law, would reduce, how many would be cut out, he stated he could not tell us, and he did not know whether any reduction could be made.

Mr. Chairman, the decision or ruling cited by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], made by the Member from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], when acting Chairman, is not on all fours with this amendment or rider, because the proposition there was to reduce the number of Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10. This is not a proposition to reduce the number of clerks in a single bureau in any of the departments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the committee that under a special order of the House at 4 o'clock the committee will have to rise. Unless there is somebody who is anxious further to discuss the point of order the Chair is ready to rule. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] makes a point of order against section 6 of the bill, providing in substance that the clerks of the executive departments shall work eight hours a day. The gentleman from Wyoming declares that the section is legislation and changes existing law, and therefore, under the rules of the House, is not in order on an appropriation bill.

It is the practice, under the rules of the House, that legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill unless it comes within the exception known as the Holman rule, which is clause 2 of Rule XXI. Under that rule, in certain instances, legislation is in order. Clause 2 of Rule XXI provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The Chair is of the opinion that section 6 of the bill under consideration does not retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number or salary of any officer of the United States. The Chair is also of the opinion that it does not, within the meaning of the rule, reduce the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the Chair is of the opinion that it does not reduce the amounts of money covered by the bill. So the amendment does not fall within any one of those three excepted classes.

Then the question arises that the Chair determine whether the amendment is in order under the proviso of the Holman rule. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] both concede that the Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee. Therefore the Chair will not cite authority to that effect, although the Chair could do so.

In the opinion of the Chair, an individual Member can offer germane amendments, and if they fall within any one of the first three excepted classes the amendments are in order, even if legislation. But the Chair has ruled that in the opinion of the Chair the section in question does not come within any one of those three classes. The Committee on Appropriations, being a nonlegislative committee, has no more authority to insert as a part of a bill section 6 than any Member would have the right to offer said section 6 as an amendment on the floor of the House.

Chairman GARRETT, on January 16, 1912, passing on an amendment to a provision brought in by the Committee on Appropriations, held that the Committee on Appropriations was not a legislative committee, and did not have jurisdiction of the legislative subjects that they incorporated in the bill, and therefore the section, not being authorized by a House committee or the members of a joint commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter, was out of order even if it retrenched expenditures, and he sustained the point of order, which ruling will be found in full in section 944 of the Digest.

Following that ruling Chairman HULL, of Tennessee, on December 20, 1913, ruled the same way, sustaining a point of order on the ground that the Committee on Appropriations was not a legislative committee, and therefore it was not in order for them to propose legislation, even though it might retrench expenditures.

The Chair does not feel that it is incumbent upon him to pass upon section 6 as to whether or not it would reduce expenditures. The Chair, however, is of the opinion that under the Holman rule the amendment must show that a reduction naturally follows to bring it within the purview of the rule.

The Chair does not believe that the opinion of some one that the amendment might reduce and the opinion of another that it might not is legitimate for the Chair to consider; but the Chair must determine from the amendment itself whether or not its natural consequence is to reduce expenditures.

As before stated, however, the Chair is not required to pass upon that, for the Chair is clearly of the opinion that any amendment that reduces expenditures, as authorized by the proviso of clause 2 of Rule XXI, to be in order under said Holman rule must come from a committee having jurisdiction of the legislative subject. The Committee on Appropriations in this instance not being a legislative committee was without authority to insert section 6 in the bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BORLAND offers the following amendment as a new section on page 150:

"SEC. 6. That the number of persons in the classified service authorized to be employed in the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia shall be reduced by one-tenth on or before the 30th day of June, 1917, and in order that such reduction may be made without loss of service to the Government and to equalize the hours of work required of those in the classified employments of the United States it is made the duty of heads of the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia to hereafter require, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1899, approved March 15, 1898, not less than eight hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the classified employees in those branches of the public service in which such employees are now required to work eight hours a day."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is new legislation, that it changes existing law, and that it does not come within the exceptions of the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming makes the point of order. As the Chair stated a moment ago, it will be necessary for the committee to rise, under the special order of the House.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope the Chair will hear us on the point of order at the next session.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Chair will hear gentlemen.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 12207, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF A BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 11, 1916.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the resolution (S. J. Res. 65) entitled "Joint resolution creating a Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to be absent for a week in order to attend at certain experiments in connection with the fortifications to be held at Mobile next week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Kentucky will be granted.

There was no objection.

STATUE OF HENRY MOWER RICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order heretofore adopted by the House, this time is set apart for the consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 13, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Henry Mower Rice, presented by the State of Minnesota to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the purity of his life and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] will take the chair during these ceremonies.

Mr. VOLSTEAD took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, as the veil parted from the statue and the marble figure of Henry Mower Rice stood forth in Statuary Hall the beautiful thought of Vice President MARSHALL came home with force, I have no doubt, to the minds of us all.

In the purpose which guided his life, in the spirit which imbued his public service, in the principles to which he was ever steadfast, in the great work which he achieved for his State and his fellow men, as in the memories which his statue inspires, Henry Mower Rice still lives.

He lives in the friendly treaties which he negotiated between our Republic and its Indian wards. He lives in the thousands of homes which through his vision and his timely missionary aid have been carved out of a wilderness. He lives in the great iron routes of travel which have carried settlement and the fruits of civilized life over a domain greater than that of New England. He lives in the great organic acts which, first, converted a northern wild into an organized Federal Territory and now for nearly two generations into one of the great sovereign States of the Union. He lives in the institutions and in the peaceful prosperity of a Commonwealth which to-day counts citizenship in millions, and he lives in the hearts and enlightened minds of hundreds of thousands of Minnesota school children who through his prophetic vision and effective public aid enjoy the fruits of perhaps the greatest public educational heritage in the world.

The ceremony which we have witnessed in our national Hall of Fame is more than the unveiling of a statue. It is more than the unveiling even of the life and the works of the man. As my mind goes back to the scenes in which he lived, to the pioneer causes for which he stood, and to those battles of the wilderness which he fought, the history of Minnesota itself seems to be unveiled as by a great magic wand. Scenes, forces, causes, and the great characters which moved on the stage of a day that is gone come before us as in a dream.

Up the valley of the Minnesota River and westward across the waving prairies to the Dakota bad lands we see the scattered bands and hear the warwhoop of the red-painted Sioux. We see their tepees of deerskin in the groves along the river and their war ponies tethered in the wild pastures, which, in the days to come, are to support one of the richest dairy regions of the earth. We see the attempts of our Government to effect friendly treaties with the Indians fail. The Sioux treaty of 1851 is repudiated. Efforts of Government agents and the resolutions of the United States Senate come to naught. Across this great fertile empire from the Mississippi westward to the Missouri we see only one stamp of human existence, and that the life of the Sioux upon the warpath; and the only law of life and liberty is the law of the tomahawk and scalping knife.

We look again, and we see the heroic figure which the sculptor has endeavored to symbolize in marble. We see the rugged frame and genial smile of this practical man of the woods and the plains—descended from hardy pilgrim stock, trained in woodcraft and Indian lore, educated both by the books of the schools and by life in the Indian fur trade, with heart big enough to feel the rights of both redskin and white-face, and with brain and shoulders broad enough to bring the hostile forces to the common ground of human right and peace—we see this man throwing to the winds the conflicting claims of Government and Indian war chieftains, and bring forth a new treaty, acceptable to all, establishing the redskin bands in happy hunting grounds and opening the great prairies west of the Mississippi to the march of settlement and civilization.

We see this man so trusted by the tribes of the Winnebagoes, who dwell in Iowa to the south, that their chieftains ask him to sign their treaties in their stead; and the stroke of his pen opens to white settlement vast areas of that great agricultural Commonwealth.

We see him as he embarks for the North by barge and birch-bark canoe up the far reaches of the Mississippi to the head sources of the Father of Waters, and thence through pine-clad lakes and streams over the divide to Lake Superior; and we see this man linking to our Government with ties of friendship that ever shall endure the Chippewa Tribes of the North, while opening to development a vast lumber industry and eventually the greatest iron ore resources of the world.

We see him elected Territorial Delegate of Minnesota to the National Capitol, and with Douglas penning the act which gave Minnesota its constitution, its boundaries, and its sovereign statehood. We see him elected first United States Senator of the North Star State, and we see that great triumvirate of pioneer statesmanship—Gen. Sibley, Gov. Ramsey, and Senator Rice—laying that foundation of liberal grants of public lands which has made Minnesota one of the foremost States in railroad transportation and agriculture, and the most richly endowed educational Commonwealth in our Union. We see county and lake and city park and street named in his honor. We see him appointed president of the board of regents of the great State university which his wisdom so richly endowed. We see him elected to the Legion of Honor for civic duty in public service. We are with him in the hour of his death in a distant State, when a message of love and brotherhood, and of faith in his final safe voyage to a happier land beyond, is sent to him by his redskin brothers from the northern forests of Lake Superior.

It gives me the greater pleasure to participate in this public commemoration here to-day because it was my privilege as a boy and young man to have met Mr. Rice and to have had personal knowledge of his great services. The great work he has done for our State comes home to me with special force, because the congressional district which I represent, the third Minnesota, was the first home of Mr. Rice and was the seat of his early activities. Moreover, nine of the ten counties of the district are carved out of the Sioux Indian possessions which through the missionary labors of Mr. Rice were ceded to us for settlement; and Rice County, to which Mr. Rice gave his name and a valuable historical library, has always been one of the leading counties of the third congressional district.

Both Senator Rice and Gen. Sibley made their early home in Mendota, on the west bank of the Mississippi, in Dakota County; and at one time it was contemplated to establish the Territorial capital at Mendota instead of across the river on the St. Paul side. When Gov. Ramsey, the first Territorial governor, came to Minnesota by appointment of President Taylor, he likewise made his first home on the Mendota side, and on the day he entered upon his executive duties he paddled over the river in a birch-bark canoe from the home of Gen. Sibley on the Mendota side. History even records that were it not for one Joseph Rolette, a member of the Territorial legislature from Pembina, who stole, or otherwise purloined in an unparliamentary manner, the Territorial bill establishing the State capital, the city of St. Peter, my own home, would have been the capital of Minnesota, in which the first State legislature would have met to elect Henry Mower Rice the first United States Senator from the North Star State.

Our State and our Nation to-day are paying just tribute to the memory of this man, who, both by the life he lived and by the ancestry he bore, was in every sense of the word "nature's nobleman." It is a strange coincidence that, just as his life ran 77 years, so the period which has elapsed from the day he first reached Fort Snelling on the Minnesota River to the day when we erect this statue to his memory is 77 years. What a period these 77 years have been in the history of the human race, and how noble has been the part which he has had in that history. It has taken us 77 years to measure the greatness of this man, but the full measure of his service to his country and his fellow men shall not be known until the end of time. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, Henry Mower Rice was Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Minnesota from December 5, 1853, to March 4, 1857, and the enabling act or act authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a State government was passed February 26, 1857, six days before the end of his term of service as Delegate. The act admitting the State into the Union was passed May 11, 1858, and Mr. Rice, having already been elected one of the Senators of the new State, took his seat in that body the next day, May 12, and served to March 4, 1863.

Mr. Rice was well known and highly respected among the various tribes of Indians in the northwestern country, for he had been a trader among them in pioneer days. He rendered valuable service in negotiating many of the treaties with the Indians whereby large tracts of land were ceded to the United States. One of his last public services was in the capacity of chairman of the Chippewa Indian Commission, which successfully negotiated for the cession of over 4,000,000 acres from the Chippewas in northern Minnesota under the act of January 14, 1889 (Nelson Act). Most of this area is now in my congressional district.

The State of Minnesota was fortunate in the character of its early pioneers. The westward rush of settlers consequent upon the discovery of gold in California in 1848 brought quite a tide of immigration to Minnesota. Most of these settlers came from the States of the East—Pennsylvania, New York, and New England. They laid the foundation of the new Commonwealth deep and broad—made liberal provisions for schools, internal improvements, and State institutions. The public and municipal laws were patterned after the most advanced models. The New England town organization was embedded in the constitution, and to this day the people of the State in annual town meetings exercise direct legislative power. This has worked so well that the principles of direct popular voice in the making of laws and selection of public servants has been extended to the nomination of local, county, district, State, and even National officers by direct primaries. Our State was one of the first of the Western States to follow the lead of New York in adopting a written code not only to govern court procedure but to define crimes and civil rights.

Senator Henry Mower Rice was elected Delegate for the Territory of Minnesota in the fall of 1852, and took his seat in December, 1853. That year my father moved from Wisconsin and settled in Houston County, in the extreme southeastern corner of the State, and as he was a Democrat until the breaking out of the Civil War, I have no doubt he voted for Mr. Rice as Delegate at the election of 1854. I remember his telling me he voted for Douglas for President in 1860; but like most of the soldiers at the front he voted for Lincoln in 1864.

I met Senator Rice only once, and I remember him as a kindly, affable, and distinguished looking gentleman. I had then just located, as a young lawyer, in northern Minnesota, and he was kind enough to give me encouragement and to speak in enthusiastic terms of the future of that part of the State. We are told that Senator Rice first came to Minnesota in 1839, when only 22 years of age, and while there were scarcely any white settlers in the whole country. In his business of trading with the Indians he must have traveled extensively throughout the whole State in those early days. What an interesting sight it must have been to view the beautiful landscapes at a time when they were in their primeval grandeur and beauty! He was a close observer and a business man rather than an orator. The work he did in framing the organic act and securing liberal land grants for the future State, its schools, its highways, and its railroads, show that he fully realized the magnificent future of the new Commonwealth and its people.

The impulse to do something in the world, when strong in the human soul, is a mark of greatness. This impulse or creative instinct finds expression and outlet in various ways—in public service as civil, military, or religious leaders; in great works of literature or of the fine arts. The work of founding a city, a municipality, a state, or a nation upon enlightened principles is a most valuable public service and one which in its influence for good long endures. This impulse was strong in Washington. He not only was the father of a new nation, but spent much labor and effort in founding in the wilderness the city of Washington, destined to become the model and most beautiful city in the world. This aspiration and desire to be of public service was strong in Senator Rice. Having an intimate knowledge of the country in those early days and being able to foresee its great future, he was well qualified for the great work of state building. No doubt as he traveled through the deep forests and verdant plains of northern Minnesota he foresaw that it would be the home of a teeming population in the not distant future. With prophetic eye he saw the present as well as the future, and could with the poet Whittier sing—

I see the swarthy trappers come
From Mississippi's springs;
And war chiefs with their painted brows,
And crests of eagle wings.

I hear the wild rice eater thresh
The grain he has not sown:
I see with flashing scythe of fire
The prairie harvest mown.

I hear the tread of pioneers
Of nations yet to be;
The first low wash of waves, where soon
Shall roll a human sea.

The rudiments of empire here
Are plastic yet and warn;
The chaos of a mighty world
Is rounding into form.

Each rude and jostling fragment soon
Its fitting place shall find—
The raw material of a State,
Its muscle, and its mind.

Minnesota was indeed fortunate in obtaining the services, in the formative period of its history, of such men as Henry M. Rice. His character was as white as the marble of which his statue is made. He was a good man, and in the sense that I have indicated he possessed greatness also. It is therefore fitting and proper that the great North Star State should honor his memory by placing his statue in this sacred hall. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the founder of any institution is always the most interesting character ever associated with that institution. The builders of a State or a nation always occupy in the minds and thoughts of the people who therein later dwell perhaps a more important and higher place than is accorded to their successors, however great may be their deeds. The pioneers of any region are always the most distinctive characters that ever enter into the history of the region. The pioneers who have builded that part of America which lies west of the Atlantic coast are perhaps entitled to the highest consideration and tribute of any class of people that have ever lived in the world. When we think of the deeds of soldiers who have fought for the right on many a field since history began, we feel thrilled by their devotion and their achievements; but if I read history aright, all the deeds that have ever been performed by soldiers, however noble, however great, are not equal in importance to the redeeming of this great continent by the pioneers of America.

They were an extraordinary lot of men, self-reliant, capable, vigorous, determined. Physical courage and moral courage alike animated them throughout the course of their lives. Of this class of men Henry M. Rice was a conspicuous member. I can not help but reflect that he was born in Vermont, that little but wonderful State. Those hills and those mountains whose sturdy strength imparted some of their own vigor to their sons and daughters have inspired with elevated sentiment and a desire nobly to achieve all whose childhood dwelt among them during the whole subsequent course of their lives. Their strength has been the strength of the hills; their purity that of the clear sky above.

Mr. Rice came westward a young man of 19, and stopped first in Michigan. He had been in that region but two years when, in 1837, he was selected by that important Commonwealth as assistant engineer to locate the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. I do not know as those people of that time could possibly have foreseen the importance of that location to the future. This work, small as it may have been then, showed the genius and the touch of the pioneer and the statesman. This little canal, then located in part by Henry M. Rice, has become the greatest canal for commerce in all the world. The achievement of France in digging the Suez Canal and of the United States in completing the Panama Canal will be great achievements throughout all time, but the commerce that either will ever carry is small in comparison with the commerce now borne by the Sault Ste. Marie. Eighty millions of tons last year spell the importance of that little stream of water to American commerce.

Two years later, the spirit of the pioneer still actuating him, Mr. Rice moved to the great Northwest, to stop where every wise man at that time should have stopped, in what is now Minnesota. There is to me something significant in the fact that when he started on this journey from Michigan to the great Northwest there was published by a distinguished professor and clergyman of New England a book the purport of which was that, after traveling over the great Northwest, consisting mainly of what is now Minnesota, he advised his countrymen that that region never could become the permanent habitation of a civilized community; that the rigors of the climate were so great and the difficulties of overcoming nature so extensive that it never could be an important agricultural section. Nevertheless, this hardy young man pitched his tent there.

It is further significant that in 1841 this man, with the unerring eye and practical knowledge of things as he found them, indited what is to my mind a most important communication. It was addressed to no less a personage than Henry H. Sibley, one of the great pioneers of the Northwest. In this letter he said he had decided to pitch his tent and cast his fortunes with the great northwest section, now Minnesota, because in his judgment it was sure to become a great agricultural area. It may be interesting to note also, Mr. Speaker, that at that time he stood absolutely alone in his belief. All of his associates of the time, with one exception, Mr. Brown, believed that the area could never fittingly be transformed into an agricultural region. How interesting now, as we behold the State of Minnesota, one of the leading agricultural States of the Union, and proudly boasting the title of the "Bread and Butter State." This fact is but illustrative of the genius of the man.

He found himself in a region that called for energy, strategy, common sense, honesty, and industry. There it was that the great battle line existed between the wood Indians of the North, the Chippewas, and the fearless riders of the plain, the dauntless Sioux. It was his mission to become the friend of both of these great elements of Indians. It was his mission, in a way, to pave their minds for the entrance of the white man to assist them in developing the lands. True it is, he came there a business man, representing a great fur-trading company, but also true it is that he realized the bigger and larger mission he and his other pioneers were called upon to perform, and he did it in a way second to none.

It may be also interesting to know on this occasion that he is mainly responsible for the prosperity, at least in the early days, of the capital city of our State. His position among the pioneers of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota at that time was such that every move he made was looked up to and respected. He selected the present site of the city of St. Paul as a place in which he should devote his life energies. When he did that St. Paul became the center of interest of the people of that region, and as a consequence thereof sprang into the lead and has ever since been one of the imperial cities of the Mississippi Valley.

Minnesota honors its pioneers. We honor every man who labored, built deep and strong the foundations of that Commonwealth. We honor Henry M. Rice because his vision was not confined by the narrow horrizon of his own State. To him the veil was lifted and he beheld the future in all its brighter aspects. He, as an educated man, knew the value of institutions of learning, and therefore he gave as one of his chief works the grant to the State university of a sufficient quantity of public land to insure its stability and to provide for its development through the future days. He builded perhaps better than he knew, for at that time it did not enter into the minds of men that any of the land then selected would contain the priceless treasures of mineral deposits, but we of this day now know that embedded in many of these lands are found the richest iron mines of the world, and to-day the university of our State is blessed with a permanent endowment fund so that in the many decades to follow it will be in a financial position doubtless stronger than any other institution in America.

We honor him among the pioneers of his time because he recognized the value of railroad building, of road building, of communication, and many of the splendid highways of commerce now found in the Northwest sprung from the magic touch which he gave the situation. We honor him because of the sturdy manhood and because of the splendid citizen qualities he always displayed. He was on the side of good government, on the side of moral life, on the side of all the elements that go to make a free people strong and enduring. He, however, was no accident. In his veins flowed the blood of sterling worth; he was a direct lineal descendant of Warren Hastings, the famous governor of the English East Indies. The blood that filled his veins gave him vigor, strength, courage, and he is entitled to the place we give him here to-day, one of the premier positions among the numerous noble and heroic pioneers that have builded the great Northwest. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota took the chair.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, Minnesota has presented to the United States a statue of Henry M. Rice as its contribution to Statuary Hall. By that act the State has in a conspicuous manner honored his memory. The statues of only two citizens of any one State can be placed in this Hall. It is illustrious company to which our citizen has been elected. The figure of George Washington and that of Ethan Allen, Samuel Adams, Robert Livingston, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, James A. Garfield, Lew Wallace, and others equally well known make a unique gathering of the Nation's great.

Soldiers and statesmen predominate, but men who occupied other positions are also represented. In this group Robert Fulton sits bent over a model of his steamboat. Florida, grateful to Dr. John Gorrie, inventor of artificial ice, has placed his statue here. The missionary pioneers are represented in the figure of Marquette. The kindly face of Roger Williams, the great apostle of religious tolerance, reminds us of his work. The presence of the sturdy figure of Robert E. Lee, the great military genius of the Confederacy, testifies to a reunited North and South. The only woman whose figure appears is that of Frances E. Willard. Her great and noble work justly entitles her to that honor. Not far from the statue of Henry M. Rice is that of James Shields, placed there by the State of Illinois. James Shields was elected Senator of the State of Minnesota at the same time as Mr. Rice. It is rather remarkable that the statues of the two first Senators of the State should have been placed in this American Valhalla.

The presence of these statues make this Hall a shrine near which patriotic Americans love to linger. Not only does the Hall appeal to us because of the purpose to which it is now dedicated, but also because of the memories that cluster about it. It has often reechoed with the earnest appeals of the noted men holding counsels here. The great struggle over the slavery question took place in this Hall. May we not fancy that the spirits of these men linger here upon the scene of their struggles; that they are here to keep watch over the land they loved so well? Such fancies, though akin to dreams, have their uses. The past, with its struggles and triumphs, is another world that we may inhabit while we live in this. The past had its men and women that we may know, love, and admire. It is because of that love and admiration that we erect statues. These are erected not to please the dead but to profit the living. Though these bronze and marble figures do not speak to us in audible language, their presence brings vividly to mind the character and services of the men they represent and plead eloquently for a life of useful and patriotic service in emulation of their lives.

For ages the world's chief occupation was war. The path to wealth and station was then over the battle field, but civilization has tended to lift from obscurity the man of civic virtues and place him on a footing of equality with the warrior and even to exalting him to a higher level. Some years ago the people of France were asked to say by their votes who, during the last century, was their greatest man, and Pasteur, a modest chemist, won easily over Napoleon, perhaps the world's greatest military genius. The more useful and permanent services rendered to humanity by this great scientist outweighed, in their judgment, the achievements of the great soldier.

Henry M. Rice, the man we honor, was not a soldier; his life was that of a pathfinder, a pioneer. The services he and his associates rendered in winning Minnesota from a wilderness shows what intelligence and enterprise can accomplish. Their achievements illustrate again the truth that wealth is not in fertile plains, in magnificent forests, or inexhaustible mines, but in the intelligent use of such resources. For centuries the skill and industry of the farmer was unknown, no lumberman felled the forest, and no miner dug for hidden wealth. With the advent of these men came a sudden change. The land that gave but a scant living to bands of a few thousand militant red men became rich enough not only to feed the millions within its borders but also other millions in our own and foreign lands. Instead of want and strife and misery came wealth and peace and well-being, with all the blessings of civilized life.

In this beneficent transformation Henry M. Rice had a leading part, and it is in recognition of the debt we owe to him for his share in this work that his statue has been placed in Statuary Hall. He was one of a group of strong and resourceful men that found a land occupied only by a few roaming Indians and who in a short decade established over it civil government, extinguished nearly all the Indian titles and guided the destinies of the embryo State as it grew from a few hundred traders and trappers to a population of hundreds of thousands. They created Territorial, State, county, township, and municipal governments; established churches, schools, colleges, and a university; built roads and bridges; found markets and developed industrial centers to care for the needs of the settlers.

As the history of some of these men are intimately interwoven, I may be pardoned for mentioning one or two in addition to Henry M. Rice.

To Gen. Henry H. Sibley is due the credit of having secured a Territorial form of government. Without any credentials from any organized form of government, he appeared before Congress representing the settlers in that part of the Territory of Wisconsin which had been excluded from the State when Wisconsin was admitted to the Union and asked for a seat as a Delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin. This was granted and, as such Delegate, he secured the passage, in 1849, of an act creating the Territory of Minnesota. This act reserved to the future State sections 16 and 36 in each township for school purposes. This was twice as much land as had up to that date been reserved to any State for that purpose. He also secured a reservation to two townships for a State university.

Henry M. Rice succeeded Mr. Sibley as a Delegate in Congress and, in 1857, was instrumental in securing the passage of an act enabling the Territory to frame a State constitution. This act, in addition to the usual grants of land, gave to the State to aid public schools two sections in each township and thus made effective the reservation secured by Mr. Sibley. Mr. Rice, as a Delegate and afterwards as one of the first Senators of the State, was successful in passing a number of important acts that greatly aided in the rapid development of the State. He was a leader not only as a Delegate and Senator, but also as a private citizen, and contributed much to the development of the State and the city of St. Paul, his home.

Through the influence and active effort of Gov. Ramsey the Sioux Indians entered into treaties by which they surrendered title to nearly all of the south half of the State. Later the Winnebago and Chippewa Indians by treaties released their title to most of the lands in the north half.

The influence of Mr. Rice aided very materially in securing the treaties from these northern Indians with whom he had dealt as an Indian trader. No attempt will be made to give even in outline the history of either of these men. Suffice it to say that Sibley, in addition to his position as Delegate in Congress, was the first governor of the State and was afterwards made the commanding officer of our forces in the great Indian outbreak of 1862. For his services in that war he was made a brigadier general. Alexander Ramsey was the first Territorial governor, the second State governor, and as such is known as the war governor. He was also United States Senator, and under President Hayes Secretary of War, and for a short time in charge of the Navy Department. In recognition of the services rendered by these men, Rice County was named for Henry M. Rice, Sibley for Henry H. Sibley, and Ramsey for Alexander Ramsey.

In honoring Henry M. Rice we are honoring the early pioneers, many of whom are still living in different parts of the State. A person not familiar with pioneer life can know but little of the dangers and difficulties they underwent, can know but little of the characteristics developed in the struggle to conquer a new country. It requires courage and enterprise. It is no easy task to bid good-by to home and friends and venture out into a wilderness there to create anew all the advantages of civilized life. It requires the patience and perseverance of a saint. Long and weary years must elapse in building a community. It requires a spirit of cooperation to organize towns, cities, counties, and States; establish schools and churches; build roads and provide the other conveniences and necessities of community life. In this work they were compelled to lean upon each other for assistance. Though they lived many miles apart they still felt that they were neighbors. The prejudice of creed and race was forgotten in the generous hospitality that each extended to the other. No pioneer refused to shelter the wayfaring or share with him his last crust. These men grew strong, resourceful, and self-reliant, no matter how discouraging the prospects, no matter how humble their huts; they had the vision of the dawning of brighter day. These sturdy men built the State; they built it not only for themselves but for the future as well. We honor them and take pleasure in honoring one of their most conspicuous representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, Minnesota originally was a part of New France and was explored by French fur traders, adventurers, and missionaries. Among the earliest of these were Jean Nicolet, Nicholas Perrot, Daniel Greysalon Duluth, men of great energy and courage. These cleared and opened the way for the pioneers who were to follow. Opportunities for profit in the fur trade, the love of adventure, and the hope of discovering the northwest passage spurred on the youth of New France to penetrate the wilds of the unknown Northwest.

In their wake came the missionaries to teach the savage a new conception of the Great Spirit. Chief among these early missionaries were Fathers Menard and Allouez. Menard perished among the savages he sought to save, and Allouez established a mission as early as 1665 at La Point, Lake Superior, where he met not only the Hurons, who had been driven westward from New York by their powerful enemies, the Iroquois, but the Chippewas and Dakotas, who inhabited that country, which was soon to become one of the greatest Commonwealths of the United States and which was then known in song as "Tinted Water," or Minnesota.

Prof. Kirk says:

Whether by conquest or ancient heritage, Minnesota was peculiarly the land of the Dakotas, in which other tribes mentioned were but the sojourners of a day. Nomadic in their habits, yet deeply attached to the land of their fathers. Passionate in temperament and restive under restraint, they were quick to perceive a wrong; fierce, revengeful, and relentless. Hence bloody massacres stand as grewsome sentinels along the course of their whole history.

In stature they are slight and tall, of Grecian cast of countenance. They lived in villages scattered over the State and subsisted upon wild rice, corn, maple sugar, wild berries, and game. Savages as they were when the white man discovered them, they were not an unhappy people. However, years of contact with the whites caused them to change their mode of living and to depend more or less upon the whites for subsistence, and by reason of their dependency were easily induced to cede to the whites practically all of their valuable lands for a mere pittance, with a jug of rum thrown in.

The voyageurs, the fur traders, and the missionary fathers dwelt among these children of the chase for nearly 200 years before the pioneer came upon the scene. Many of the voyageurs became enamored with the life of the Indians and married into and lived with the tribes.

But upon the arrival of the brave and liberty-loving home seekers the old order of things had to give way. The trader needed the Indian in his business, but the home seeker needed the Indian's land. As a result, the home seeker had to make terms with both the Indian and the fur trader.

Before the advent of the white man the Indian killed only such game as he needed for food, and, as a result, game remained plentiful; but all this changed when he killed game for barter with the fur trader.

By the year 1819, the date of the establishment of Fort Snelling, the fur trader had about run his course. Therefore he had no objection to the home seeker's coming, but rather welcomed it. The establishment of Fort Snelling marked a new era. The red man's sun set to rise no more. His white brother desired his pine forests, his rich and fertile prairies, his Father of Waters and all its tributaries, his sparkling lakes and their myriad of fish, his rich mines, his beautiful sunset, balmy breezes, and healthful climate. All were demanded in the name of civilization and the Great Jehovah, as an abiding place for a race of men, strong of stature, noble, generous, and brave by nature. They came to enrich, not to impoverish, the empire. They came to build homes, schoolhouses, and churches, and to establish a government where justice, liberty, and equality might reign supreme under the law.

These were the sentiments which impelled and actuated our forefathers to brave the trials, hardships, and privations of frontier life. Humanity, charity, and brotherly love everywhere characterized their conduct in those days of struggle and hardship. The stranger or unfortunate was welcomed at every fireside.

In 1849 we find the pioneer organizing and establishing a Territorial government; in 1858 assuming the obligations of statehood; in 1861 furnishing an army to preserve the Republic; in 1862 battling with the savage Sioux, who had committed all the crimes and atrocities known to savage warfare, and spread death and desolation with the tomahawk and torch among the settlers.

The pages of Minnesota's history are replete with the names of men and women who have made large sacrifices and rendered great and enduring service to the State. The Pond brothers, Riggs, Whipple, Reveoue, Williamson and his sister, Sibley, Ramsey, Rice, and Gorman form a galaxy of men and women that not only every Minnesotan should remember with profound reverence, respect, admiration, and gratitude, but to whom every citizen throughout our land should do honor for the part they took in founding a great Commonwealth, in civilizing and Christianizing the Indian, and in preserving the Union of these United States.

Gov. Ramsey made the first tender of troops to President Lincoln on the day that a Confederate cannon in Charleston Harbor proclaimed to the world that hitherto friendly and loyal people were about to enter into a mighty conflict to test the indissolubility of our Government; likewise Henry Sibley, during the existence of that mighty civil strife, in 1862 paralyzed the hand of the savage Sioux, who were spreading death and desolation among the frontier settlements of Minnesota.

However, much as I desire on all occasions, when the history of my State is under consideration, to pay reverential respect to all of its founders, I am compelled to refrain from doing so, because on this occasion the exercises are in commemoration of the life and service of only one of Minnesota's most distinguished citizens, the late Hon. Henry Mower Rice, by no means the least of the three foremost pioneers of the great Northwest, Ramsey, Sibley, and Rice, all men of high character and honorable purposes—statemen in the truest sense of the word—each vying with the other to render service to the pioneer settlers of Minnesota, as well as to the Nation.

Dr. William Watts Folwell, one of Minnesota's noted historians, said:

Mr. Rice's personal qualities were such that he could not help desiring public employment and obtaining great success in it. His manners were so gracious, and yet not patronizing, that he made friends with all sorts and conditions of men. He divined with unerring instinct the motives of men and parties, and knew when and how by appropriate suggestion to lead them apparently to move themselves to his desired ends.

The gracious characteristics that Dr. Folwell speaks of made Mr. Rice one of America's most popular men.

Born in Watsfield, Vt., November 29, 1816, he spent the greater part of his life at St. Paul, Minn., engaged in large undertakings and outlining broad governmental policies for his adopted State. He died, honored and lamented, January 15, 1894.

He first became known to fame in the location of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and other public works authorized by the State of Michigan.

In 1839 he settled at Fort Snelling as public attaché of the settler's department of the post, and soon afterwards moved to St. Paul and became a partner in the firm of Chouteau & Co., of St. Louis, who took over the business of the American Fur Co. This brought him in contact with the Chippewa and Winnebago Tribes of Indians, and by courage, coolness, fairness, and tact came in time to exert a remarkable influence over these tribes.

In 1846 the Winnebagoes exhibited their confidence in Mr. Rice by making him a delegate, in lieu of their native chief, to represent them in the sale of their reservation in Iowa to the United States.

Mr. Rice not only negotiated a useful treaty on this occasion, but during succeeding years, mainly as commissioner, in 1847 to 1889, aided materially in securing accession to the United States of Sioux, Chippewa, and other lands, covering the greater part of Minnesota.

Mr. Rice always retained the confidence and affection of the Chippewa Tribe of Indians. He was called by them Wha-bee-mah-no-min, or White Rice.

The St. Paul Dispatch, in an editorial commenting upon Mr. Rice's commission of 1889, received from President Cleveland, had this to say:

For the successful conduct of these negotiations the chief, if not the entire, credit is due the Hon. Henry Mower Rice. His selection as one of the commissioners is the wisest possible choice which could have been made. It is a singular coincidence that exactly the same day of the same month 42 years ago, August 27, 1847, Mr. Rice succeeded in successfully concluding a treaty with the same band ceding valuable lands to the people. His courage and experience, combined with his intimate knowledge of Indian character, enabled him to carry through an undertaking attended by difficulty which amounted to serious danger of bloodshed.

The Democrats of the Territory, recognizing his ability, sent him to Congress in 1853, and reelected him in 1855, and as a recognition of his services in procuring the passage of an act authorizing the admission of Minnesota to the Union elected him to the United States Senate in 1857.

While in the Senate he labored arduously to avert a conflict of arms, but when his labors failed he displayed uncompromising loyalty to the Union and rendered distinguished service as Senator in the preservation of the Union during the trying days of the rebellion. His kindness to the volunteer soldier will never be forgotten while a Minnesota veteran lives to tell the tale. After his retirement from the Senate he became treasurer of Ramsey County for three successive terms. His work in this office was of the same high character that distinguished him in every other position of trust and honor which he occupied.

While Mr. Rice gave freely of his time to matters of State, nevertheless he had an eye for business and was quite as successful in the commercial world as in the political. At one time he owned 80 acres of land in the heart of the city of St. Paul upon which streets and blocks were laid out, warehouses, hotels, stores, and residences were built and sites for churches, schools, hospitals, and parks were donated by him to the city. He was in a large sense one of the leaders in founding the city of St. Paul. His holdings came to be worth millions.

He and three other Minnesotans were the incorporators of the Northern Pacific Railway. He gave freely of his money. His purse was always open to both public and private needs. No man looked to him in vain for assistance. His preeminent characteristics were generosity, affability, and love of mankind. This trinity of ennobling traits made men love, respect, and follow him. All sorts and conditions of men paid him homage. He mingled with the savage Sioux chief with the same kingly bearing that won him the confidence and lasting friendship of such distinguished statesmen as John C. Breckenridge, Robert Tombs, Stephen A. Douglas, and many other public men of his day.

The exigencies of every great occasion bring forth a genius to lead men out of darkness into light.

The present European war will continue until some master mind appears capable of penetrating the dense and horrible war cloud that for months has settled down upon the unhappy people of Europe. Not until the arrival of such a man will peace be restored to our brothers across the sea.

Minnesota was fortunate, indeed, in having so wise and patriotic a hand as that of Henry Mower Rice to guide and protect her people in the formative period of her history, and the aborigine, on the dawn of the white man's day in Minnesota, was especially favored in having in a position of power and influence a white brother with a heart so big that it took in all mankind in its love and solicitude for the human family.

The State of Minnesota gave public acknowledgment of its debt of gratitude to Mr. Rice by adopting the following resolution on April 11, 1899:

Whereas, by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, provision was made for placing in the National Gallery of Statuary, in the Capitol at Washington, by each State, of the statues of two of its deceased citizens, illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military services; and

Whereas the Hon. Henry M. Rice was, from the year 1846, in which he negotiated a treaty by which a large portion of the territory now comprising the State of Minnesota was acquired from the aborigines, until his death preeminent in its service in the positions of Territorial Delegate, first United States Senator, and many other distinguished and useful capacities, as to entitle him to the commemoration provided for in said act: Therefore Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the said Henry M. Rice be, and he is hereby, designated as one of the persons to be thus honored, and that a suitable statue to represent him be placed by the State in said National Gallery.

The imposing statue of the Hon. Henry Mower Rice recently erected in the National Gallery of Statuary in this Capitol of these United States has been in response to the request of the citizens of Minnesota as expressed in the above resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that the legislative representatives of the people of the State of Minnesota deem it proper to honor the memory of a man of the pioneer type in placing the statue of Henry M. Rice in the Capitol of the Nation, placing his life, his character, and his work before the people of the Nation as typical of the men of whom Minnesota is proud. Flourishing now and one of the most prosperous of the Union, Minnesota recalls the memory of her first citizens with sincere feelings of love and respect. She is proud of their work; proud of her development under their toil. Henry M. Rice was a leader among the first citizens of Minnesota, and in placing his statue in the Hall of Fame the State is not only immortalizing is life and his work but is placing before the generations to come proof of her regard for the men who first sealed their fate with hers. A tribute to his memory is a tribute to the memory of every man and woman among his coworkers.

Fifth in line of descent from Pilgrim ancestors, Henry M. Rice, upon reaching early manhood, "struck for the new frontier" to win name and honor for himself and to assist in the work of laying the foundation stone of a State destined eventually to take a place among the foremost of the sisterhood of the Union. He first entered the military establishment at Fort Snelling, and later engaged in fur trading for several years. In this work he was constantly in close touch with nature, and he soon learned to love the beauties of the land about him, the lakes of sky-blue water, the rolling prairies, the dense forests of stalwart pines, the beauties of springtime, and the fascination of the snow-white winters. He saw opportunity on every side and pictured the future of this great State. He felt the call of an unclaimed land awaiting the hand of the toiler and ready to respond generously to his efforts. He pictured the future of the great Commonwealth to develop under the hand of the settler, and his efforts were constantly directed toward the development of the State.

A strong personality, a gracious manner, courteous at all times, and possessed of an instinctive knowledge of the wishes of men and parties, Henry M. Rice was qualified for public life. Public-spirited to an extreme degree, he participated actively in all movements for the development of his home—St. Paul—and through his energy and enthusiasm won for himself the loyal support of his fellow citizens.

His labors, however, were not confined to his home city. His influence extended into all State matters and his early training gave him an insight into the needs and necessities of the country and the traits and character of the Indians with whom it was necessary to deal, which aided him materially in his later public life. His first work was done among the Indians. Fearless in battle and quick to resent the intrusion of the white man upon their domain, the Indians of Minnesota could be dealt with only as man to man, and to Henry M. Rice must be given much of the credit due for the treaties with the Chippewas and Sioux which opened up the fertile fields of Minnesota to the white settlers and made possible the development of the great lumber industries of the State.

In 1853 Mr. Rice took his seat as Delegate to Congress, and his industry, persuasiveness, and strong personality soon placed him in a position of influence. His activity in securing land surveys, land offices, post offices, and the opening of lands to settlement won for him a popularity hardly equaled in Minnesota history. When the time came for Minnesota to seek admission as a State unit, Mr. Rice was very active in securing the passage of the act which authorized the framing of the State constitution. When the State was finally admitted, he was rewarded for his efforts in the interests of his State by being elected one of the first of Minnesota's United States Senators. In this capacity he was equally energetic in the interests of his State.

Minnesota is grateful for the work of her pioneers. She wishes the Nation to know and she wishes posterity to know her appreciation of their efforts. Each State is allowed, under the law, to honor the memory of two most prominent sons by placing their statues in the Hall of Fame. In making her first selection Minnesota has chosen from the ranks of the men to whom she is most deeply indebted. She has chosen a man who was among the first of those who placed their lives and their futures in Minnesota and who gave the best of their lives to her development. As the years pass by, thousands of citizens will visit the Hall of Fame and look upon the statues of the Nation's builders. Among them will be the stalwart figure of Henry M. Rice, chosen from among the first of Minnesota's citizens to typify the life, character, ambitions, and work of pioneer Minnesota. The son or daughter of Minnesota who sees his statue there will see beside him the phantom forms of Alexander Ramsey, Henry Hastings Sibley, and their sturdy coworkers, all striving to speed the day when their chosen State would take the place which they knew in their hearts she must inevitably win. The statue of Henry Mower Rice is a tribute to his memory, a memorial to the history of Minnesota, and will serve as an inspiration to the young men and women who in the years to come will carry on her work. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON took the chair.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Speaker, the life and the works of a man are his monument. The marble which we erect is the expression of public sentiment. The statue which the Nation has placed in Statuary Hall is pursuant to the memorial of the people of Minnesota, expressed in the resolution of the State Legislature of Minnesota in 1899, five years after his death, praying the Federal Government of the United States to erect in honor of Henry Mower Rice a statue in recognition of his great public services to the State and Nation.

The people of Minnesota had already in many practical ways given evidence of their faith and expressed public recognition of his services by electing him twice Delegate of their Territory, the first Senator from Minnesota in the United States Senate, a member of the board of regents of the State university, and by naming in his honor the counties of Mower and of Rice. The people of St. Paul, of which he was one of the chief founders, required his public services for three terms as city treasurer and elected him president of the board of public works and president of the chamber of commerce, while the old settlers and the soldiers of Minnesota had elected him president of the Old Settlers' Association and a member of the Loyal Legion.

Historians of family ancestry trace the lineage of Henry M. Rice back through the centuries to days when lord and knight held sway by greatness of arm and heart and the power of leadership. But the plain and humble democracy of this man is disclosed by the fact that when he came to Minnesota through the wilderness from upper Michigan he came with his pack on his back, having traveled the first 200 miles of his journey on foot.

He reached Fort Snelling, on the upper Mississippi, in 1839, just two hundred years after Edmund Rice, his pilgrim ancestor, landed on the bleak coast of New England. On the side of both father and mother his ancestors had been soldiers of the American Revolution and had done loyal service in the French and Indian wars. Five generations of selectmen, soldiers, deacons, justices of the peace, tillers of the soil, and pathfinders in the pioneer struggles for American existence and freedom had laid the foundations of his character, and to this he added the knowledge obtained in the public schools, the academy, and the study of law and surveying.

We of Minnesota and the Lake Superior region to-day boast, as the evidence of the greatness of our resources and of our industrial and commercial development, that the commerce of the Great Lakes which passes through Sault Ste. Marie Canal has over three times the tonnage of that which passes through the Suez Canal in the ocean commerce between Europe and Asia, and that the Great Lakes fleet passing through our northern canal is the greatest merchant fleet which bears the American flag. It is of special interest, therefore, for us to take note, as we dedicate this statue to this man, that it was Henry M. Rice, the young surveyor of 1835, who made the first survey of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal for the State of Michigan, and that it was Henry M. Rice, the Indian-treaty maker of the forties and fifties and thereafter, who opened to white settlement the wheat lands, the pine forests, and iron ranges which furnish the bulk of the tonnage which has brought fame to the commerce of the "Soo" Canal and Great Lakes and prosperity to the industries of Minnesota and the entire upper Mississippi Valley.

His life in the pioneer wilderness of the Northwest—Army sutler at Fort Snelling and Fort Atkinson, chief fur trader among the tribes of the Winnebagoes and Chippewas, surveyor and founder of settlements, friend and coworker of both white settlers and Indian trappers, versed in wood lore and Indian lore, as familiar with the life and languages of the Sioux and Chippewas as with those of the New Englander and European immigrant—gave him that thoroughly practical grasp, that intimate understanding of men and motives, that sympathy with and knowledge of pioneer and primitive conditions which made him perhaps the most successful Indian-treaty maker our country has known.

The Winnebagoes made him their representative in Washington for the sale of their lands and the signing of their reservation treaties. The Sioux negotiated their treaties through him, after all previous efforts had resulted in failure. The first treaty which the Chippewas of Minnesota negotiated with the United States through the missionary efforts of Henry M. Rice was on August 22, 1847, and the last was on August 22, 1889—just 42 years to day—and though the several Chippewa treaties gave Minnesota nearly two-fifths of its territory, the great forest and iron-ore section of its northern domain, he held their friendship and their loyalty to the white race and the Government to the end.

The Chippewas knew Henry M. Rice as "Wab-bee-mah-no-min," or "White Rice." Though he died in San Antonio, Tex., 2,000 miles away, the Chippewa Tribe joined in sending him, at the time of his death in 1894, their message of love and brotherhood. Judge Flandreau, one of the pioneer members of the supreme bench of Minnesota, testifies that—

> Until the day of his death there was no other white man in Minnesota who had the confidence and affection of the Chippewa Tribes to anything like the same extent as Mr. Rice.

One of the reasons for this confidence and affection was that Henry M. Rice looked upon the Indian not as an alternate object of public charity and private exploitation but as a man and brother entitled to plain justice. His ambition was to make the Indian a self-supporting citizen. In the State of Minnesota, which is larger than New England, and in the Territory of Minnesota, which at that time comprised a domain equal to New England and the Middle States, he believed there was room enough and land enough, if wisely and justly divided, to accommodate both the scattered Indian bands and a large white population. He protected the Indians from aggression by setting aside for them extensive reservations, provided with schools and industrial facilities and exempt from whisky and taxation. The greed of men has in part defeated his statesmanlike purpose, and yet the progress that is now being made shows that his faith was not misplaced and that his dream may yet come true.

The benefits of Mr. Rice's Indian treaties to the white race are beyond the scope of this occasion to describe. The 20,000,000 acres which his tact and ability secured by negotiation from the Sioux became the foundation of the great spring-wheat industry which has made the country west of the upper Mississippi famous as the leading bread-producing district of the world. The forests of pine and spruce obtained from the Chippewas have given Minnesota leadership in the production of white-pine lumber and newsprint paper. The three iron ranges of northern Minnesota, located in the old hunting and trapping haunts of the Chippewas, produce three-fourths of the iron ore of the United States and one-fifth that of the world.

Associated with Henry H. Sibley, Mr. Rice aided in the organization of the Territory of Minnesota in 1849, and in 1853 and 1855 was elected as Territorial Delegate to Washington. It was in that capacity that he secured in behalf of Minnesota settlers the priority right to preemption of unsurveyed lands as against purchase by speculators. It was as Territorial Delegate, moreover, that he secured, through the cooperation of Senator Stephen A. Douglas, the adoption of the act authorizing the people of Minnesota to frame a constitution preparatory to admission to the Union. Through this initiative of Mr. Rice Minnesota was admitted to statehood May 11, 1858, and the people, in prompt recognition of this service, elected him as their first representative in the United States Senate.

As Territorial Delegate and as Senator Henry M. Rice was recognized as the strong influence in Washington for Minnesota development. He secured the first land offices and post offices, the postal routes and railways, the military roads and all other Federal establishments. As Senator he held the important committeeships of Public Lands and Indian Affairs, Post Offices and Post Roads, and both Military and Finance.

It was in the midst of his term as Senator that the Civil War broke out between North and South. Doing all in his power to avert such calamity, he thereafter became an uncompromising supporter of the cause of the Union. A northern Democrat, he loyally supported President Lincoln. As a member of the Senate Military and Finance Committees he was in a position to render signal service to the administration in its trying hours. Of the knowledge displayed by him in Army affairs, Senator Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, stated that Senator Rice's practical aid "was of greater service to the country than that of all other members of the committee."

On the question of slavery Senator Rice held to the true Democratic principle which prevailed through the Northwestern Territories from the adoption of the ordinance of 1787: "I am opposed to slavery for the reason that I am in favor of the largest human liberty." Just as he refused to desert the cause of the Union and of human liberty when so many Democratic States in the South joined in rebellion, he refused likewise to desert his Democratic principles and join the Republican Party when nearly all of Minnesota deserted and all public positions were open to him as the price of such desertion. He stood steadfast to the principles as he saw them in the light of his reason, his conscience, and his knowledge of American constitutional history throughout the 77 years of his life.

His place as one of the chief founders of the city of St. Paul, the State capital of Minnesota, rests upon a broad foundation. The 80 acres which he bought on the east bank of the Mississippi as early as 1848 are in the heart of the present city, and are known on the city plat as the "Rice & Irvine addition." With characteristic enterprise and liberality, he undertook the early development of the city by laying out streets and blocks and donating sites to churches, schools, hospitals, and parks. At the corner of Third and Washington Streets he built the second brick house erected in Minnesota. Rice Park, Rice Street, and Rice Lake still bear his name; and his public services and public donations to the development of his home city are a part of the history of the State and its capital.

But if we are to select from the works of this man that which shall stand as the most enduring monument and the most widespread in its beneficial and far-reaching results, perhaps we should hold as the capstone of his achievement that section of Minnesota's organic act, secured through his official energy and foresight, which by liberal grants of public lands lays the foundation of Minnesota's educational system. These grants include:

Two sections in each township for school purposes where one section was the rule before.

Seventy-two sections for a State university and 72 additional sections for a geological and natural history survey, in all 92,160 acres, to be handled by the university regents.

All swamp lands in the State, aggregating 3,000,000 acres, and 500,000 acres additional for internal improvements and institutions.

Then followed wise provisions for the conservation of these vast institutional resources, the permanent investment of all proceeds of sale and lease in permanent school and permanent university trust funds, and the use only of the interest thereon for current purposes. The State of Minnesota to-day, pursuant to the spirit and purpose of these grants and the organic act, secured through the instrumentality of Henry Mower Rice, boasts an invested educational trust fund of over $30,000,000 and aggregate unsold educational resources in school lands, mines, and forests yielding a heavy annual income from royalties, stumpage, and leases, valued by State officials at $200,000,000—the greatest public educational heritage in the world.

It is in recognition of this vast public service, it is in memory of this strong and lovable character, it is in honor of this broad-minded and public-spirited statesman, it is in tribute to this high purpose and far vision of the prophet pioneer that our State and Nation to-day erect this statue to Henry Mower Rice. It takes time to bring out in bold relief upon the scroll of history the silhouette of a great character. On November 29 of this year will fall the centennial anniversary of this man's birth. It has been a century of the greatest progress of the world in all that has made for the freedom, the prosperity, and the uplift of the common man and in the opening of the frontiers and the waste places of the earth for the homes of men, and in this vast work Henry M. Rice has borne the true nobleman's part. In his life as citizen and hardy pioneer, in the hardships which he has shared with the humble settler and Indian, in the helpfulness he has shown to his fellow men and the wise provisions he has made for the generations to come, as in the ability of his career as a statesman and the loyalty of his devotion to the principles of his country, he has proved himself a worthy scion of a splendid lineage, whom we do well to honor. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, 77 years ago, a man of 23, all his worldly goods in a pack upon his back, but in his heart the wealth and courage and faith of youth, stood upon the banks of the Mississippi, contemplating the Falls of St. Anthony.

Behind him was the birch-bark hut of the fur trader and a few skin wigwams, while about him was the spell of the "forest primeval," where "the murmuring pines and the hemlocks stood like harpers hoar."

Under the witchery of the solitude, intensified by the rustle of the leaves and the swirl of the waters, his prophetic mind was projected into the future, and he saw as we see to-day.

Up and down along the river the twin cities stretched with their 700,000 souls. He felt the might of the water rushing over the falls, and above its sound caught the roar of the mill wheels grinding the flour for one-fifth of mankind. He saw the giant pines float down on the bosom of the river in great convoys to the lumber center, and looking a little to the south he saw on a bluff, rising abruptly from the water's edge, the University of Minnesota, with which his name was destined to be linked as one of the founders and regents, and whose student enrollment to-day is 9,000.

Great buildings reared their massive structure; towers, domes, and spires pierced the sky. Numerous bridges spanned the river; varied industry breathed through a thousand factory chimneys, feeding and clothing and housing the great Middle West.

God set the panorama, placed materials and fertile soil, gave indulgent summers and bracing winters. Here was everything ready for the hand, the head, and the heart of man. What a country, if only the arteries of roads could connect it with civilization. Industry and capital would make an enduring and mighty reality. Here was work for men. His task was plain, and he set about to accomplish his vision.

This man typifies the great builders of our Nation, whose intelligence, courage, endurance, and energy wrested from nature supremacy. His success we are to-day met to commemorate, "bringing our robin's leaf to deck" his memory. The name of Henry M. Rice is inseparable from the progress, the development, the history of Minnesota. His force of character, industry, and shrewdness guided the infant State. To-day our broad plains and sunny vales are dotted with prosperous and happy homes; and to the grateful millions yet to come, because this man and his type lived and wrought, the North Star State is the promised land. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I had not thought until to-day to say anything upon this occasion, but that which has already been said inspires me to say just a word or two in regard to the spirit and philosophy of the exercises in which we are now engaged.

In that building, which seems to me to exemplify more than any other the genius and the purpose of the American people, the Library of Congress, there is a series of mural paintings illustrating the efforts of mankind to preserve and transmit to posterity that which is notable and worthy in its peculiar age and generation. The first picture is that of the cave man, as, with strong hands, he piles together the unchiseled stone to commemorate some event that to him is notable. The second is that of the old man of the tribe, as, with crude eloquence, he tells the story to the young men of the bravery of his tribe and the glory of its traditions. The third is that of the naked savage, who, with crude and unsharpened chisel, engraves upon the stone wall the hieroglyphics that tell the tale of his people. The fourth is that of the red man, as he paints with ink the pictograph of some famous chase, of some immortal battle. The fifth is that of the monk, as he sits in his silent cell and, with quill pen, writes indelibly upon the parchment the sacred and un-perishable truths of religion; and the last is that of the printing press.

To-day we, as it were, add another, but a word picture, that will serve to keep green the memory of the achievements of one of the pioneers of Minnesota, Henry M. Rice.

We are endeavoring by these exercises to erect and, in a sense, dedicate a monument to one whose achievements in the infancy of our State will be an inspiration to all who look upon his face in the Hall of Fame. Mr. Speaker, there is a legend of ancient Greece that tells us of a game in the nature of a relay race. In this game only the strong, the young, and the fleet were permitted to take part. They chose sides, and each side tried with all its might to carry one to the other a blazing torch from the starting point to the goal. Henry M. Rice carried the torch of progress and of civilization in the rugged period of Minnesota's history when the foundations of its greatness were being laid. His services have added luster to its flame and distance to its goal. [Applause.]

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, three generations ago the men in the more thickly settled portions of the East saw in the expanding territories of the West opportunity. Men in those days lived by a different rule than we live to-day. We now ask ourselves where can we go and do the best, or where can we go and get the most with the least effort? In those days men looking to the West, to the frontier of the country, used to ask themselves the question, Where can we go to become the most useful as citizens to the people with whom we are associated in our daily lives and make of ourselves the most? I picture St. Paul in the forties. I picture to myself the side-wheeler coming up the Mississippi River. I picture to myself that famous hostelry, like the old Fifth Avenue Hotel, where governors and Senators were made and unmade at the behest of men who ruled the destinies of politics, the Merchants Hotel. In 1849 when Alexander Ramsey, holding his commission from President Taylor, by way of the side-wheeler steamboat route, landed at St. Paul and went up to the Merchants Hotel, he then found the proprietor, a Mr. Bass, remodeling, fixing over in two rooms what had formerly been one, because the Territory of Minnesota had been admitted to the Union, and increased business was expected. He went across the street and found another building being remodeled, and learned from an onlooker that the other building was the governor's mansion. He did not like the outlook and took a ship down to Mendota where he found H. H. Sibley, then a delegate of the Territory in Congress. He and Sibley the next morning, after staying all night at Sibley's house, came back to St. Paul on horseback and laid the foundation of that great empire of the West so soon to become a State, first a Territory and then the State of Minnesota.

I picture to myself the stores, the buildings in the then little village of St. Paul. Picture to yourself a building, partly log, partly frame, with one-third pitched roof and little porticos or porches or verandas out in front, like the little store in the time of Lincoln at Springfield. Picture to yourselves the men with black slouched hats, negligee shirts, frock coats, trousers baggy, large, generous, cut at the bottom like a sack, and high-top boots. And in those crude half-homespun jackets, and those crude homespun trousers and shirts, and under those slouched hats, men had gone out from the East, young men from 20 to 35 years of age, bringing the culture of the academies of the East to help build up the great Middle West. There were three such pioneers; Sibley, the first governor of the State; Ramsey, the first governor of the Territory; and Henry Mower Rice, one of the first United States Senators from the State after its organization.

All were typical of the civilization, of the spirit of the times, and of the locality in which they lived and became a part. But there was some difference. I have heard the question asked, and a proper question, too, since the erection of the statue in Statuary Hall, of the man whose name we honor to-day, why he had been selected for this honor rather than perhaps one of the others, such as Sibley or Ramsey, either one of which might properly also have been selected. I take it that it is the spirit of this occasion; that it is a proper function of such a memorial that it may not only commemorate the man, but commemorate the time and locality, commemorate the activity of the city and State in which he lived, and commemorate at the same time the type of the sturdy pioneer who helped to build up that empire of the West.

But there is a distinction. There is a special reason why Henry Mower Rice and not Alexander Ramsey and not Henry H. Sibley should have been selected. There is a reason why the selection of Henry Mower Rice is eminently a proper selection. Ramsey came to Minnesota, then a Territory, with a commission from the President of the United States in his pocket as governor of the new Territory—not that that should detract from the useful life which he afterwards lived; not that that should mean for one moment that the spirit, that the activities into which he molded himself in his after career in the making of that great State, should in any way be detracted from, but it was different than the way in which our hero came to the State. Rice, a youngster of 22, imbued with the spirit of adventure; Ramsey, a former Member of Congress, who in 1846 sat in this body, which held its sessions in the old Chamber in this building, with Lincoln. Ramsey was an entirely different type of man. Of Sibley I may say the same thing. Sibley came representing a great fur-trading business, the American Fur Co., of which John Jacob Astor was the president. He came under the auspices and with the backing of the wealth of the East, while Ramsey, who had been an attorney in Pennsylvania and a Member of the House of Congress, came with the backing of political prestige. They helped to build up Minnesota. They, together with our hero in this case, Henry Mower Rice, helped to lay the foundation of the Territory and of the State, but the State and its people did not mold them to the same extent, and while they may have themselves developed Minnesota—all of them—it may be said, I think, that Minnesota and the stirring scenes of the early days did, in fact, peculiarly develop Henry Mower Rice and made him the distinct type of the time and generation in which he lived.

But I think there is another reason, and to my mind the controlling reason, after all, why, when we sift out the result, and get the sum total of human affairs, we find that certain things are done in certain ways. There is a reason why it was eminently fitting, why it was not only fitting but inevitable, that Henry Mower Rice should have been chosen by those who formerly knew him to adorn the niche assigned to our fair State in the Hall of Fame. He was the Indians' friend. He was a kindly man. He was a man who, when old Joe Roulette, whom one of my colleagues, I think Mr. DAVIS, referred to, stole the bill which kept St. Peter from becoming the capital of the State, would come to town—he was a French Canadian and in his county in the northern part of the State used to wear the Indian garb—and would go to a fashionable tailoring shop and buy himself a full complement of up-to-date clothes and would say to the tailor, "Charge it to Mr. Rice"—would, without prearrangement or notice beforehand, pay the bill because Joe Roulette was his friend. He was the kind of a man who, when he had his first campaign for governor, and I believe the only campaign for governor, after he had been in Congress, running against Gov. Marshall, who had the Republican nomination, and they had agreed upon a division of time in what they thought would be a forensic tour about the State, urging their claims for votes, and after the time had been divided twice on each side, making about three hours of division of time, got upon the platform and in 15 minutes finished his speech by saying that the people ought to elect Marshall; that Marshall was the sturdy pioneer who was entitled to become the governor of the State—and then finished the debate.

Once in the United States Senate he again showed his kindness when Senators Fessenden and Dixon got into a confab. He addressed the President of the Senate, and pleaded that such confabs be not had; that they formed a bad example for the younger Members of the Senate, and stated that he did not believe anything was to be gained from ill will, and hoped it would not happen again.

Again, when there was applause on one occasion in the galleries of the Senate, when some speaker other than himself—for he very seldom spoke—insisted that the galleries be cleared, he plead with the presiding officer not to clear them.

It was this trait of his character, the kindly spirit, the large-hearted and generous disposition toward those who honored and revered his memory, that was a great factor in the fitting selection made, and I believe Minnesota shall always enjoy a just pride in his name and memory and the fitting tribute paid to his sterling worth and type. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that we adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STEENERSON). The motion is made that the House do now adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 13, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10668) to repeal section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1906, known as the forest homestead act, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 319), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9326) to pay the balance due the loyal Creek Indians on the award made by the Senate on the 16th day of February, 1903, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 320), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8669) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to continue lease of land in Stanley County, S. Dak., for a buffalo pasture, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 321), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SHOUSE, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8108) for the relief of the legal representatives and heirs of Elizabeth Bruce, deceased, widow of the late John H. Bruce, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 322), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12248) for the relief of the estate of Mary H. S. Robertson, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 323), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LOBECK, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3794) for the relief of Thomas S. Johnson, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 324), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7062) for the relief of Erskine R. Hayes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 325), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8325) for the relief of Borden H. Mills, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 326), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6487) granting a pension to Ralph McMahon; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 10808) granting a pension to William D. Swatzell; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 9204) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Amberg; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 13, 1916.

(Legislative day of Saturday, March 11, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a report in open session from the Committee on Public Lands of the nomination of a receiver of the land office.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Myers	Simmons
Bankhead	Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hardwick	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Oliver	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hughes	Overman	Sterling

Cummins	Lane	Saulsbury	Walsh
Curtis	McCumber	Shafroth	Warren
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Works
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sherman

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and dispose of any portion of the lands included within the limits of the abandoned Fort Spokane Military Reservation, State of Washington, not necessary for hospital purposes as provided for in the act approved August 1, 1914, at not less than the appraised value thereof, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8493) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. McCUMBER conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to make a report in open session from the Committee on Public Lands of the nomination of a receiver of the land office. I merely ask leave to make the report. It will take only a second to read it. I simply make it for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and its transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who, I understand, is absent. On that account I withhold my vote. I would vote "nay" if I were not paired.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He is absent, but I am privileged to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], which I transfer to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 27, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to inquire if any Senator now wishes to speak in regard to the armor-plant bill? If not, I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia whether the proponents of this bill propose to say anything in its favor before it is voted upon?

Mr. SWANSON. The proponents of the bill are satisfied that the Senate understands this matter very well. Some one on this side might later make a speech; but there is no urgent desire on our part to discuss the bill, unless those who are opposed to it wish to do so.

Mr. OLIVER. I rather think, Mr. President, that those who do not favor the bill would like to have something to answer, and they have nothing so far since the bill has been reported.

Mr. SWANSON. The committee has made a report, which has been read to the Senate, and it seems to me that that report is sufficiently satisfactory and instructive to the Senate.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator from Virginia is satisfied, I have nothing to say.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. GORE and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. GORE. If I can reserve my objection—my colleague has addressed the Chair.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it had been my purpose to ask the Senate to take up Senate resolution No. 107 when the armor-plant bill was laid aside. Understanding, however, that my colleague is unwilling that resolution No. 107 shall come to a vote in the Senate, I feel unwilling to request the Senate to take it up and so use up the time of the Senate on this petty local matter, while such questions as national preparedness and rural credits and armor plate wait for consideration. I should like to ask my colleague if that is his position?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my opposition to resolution No. 107 is of such a character that I shall feel obliged to avail myself of such means as are within my power to prevent it from being adopted; and, in order to make assurance doubly sure, to prevent it from coming to a vote.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that House bill 408 be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, has the unfinished business been laid aside?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. So I understand.

Mr. SWANSON. Before action is taken on my request, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. As I understand, the unanimous-consent agreement which is on the calendar directs that the Senate at 4 o'clock on Tuesday, March 21, shall proceed to vote on a certain bill therein designated. As I understand, by the precedents of the Senate in various decisions, if anything else should happen to be the unfinished business at that time, it would be the duty of the Chair to enforce this unanimous-consent agreement. If that is true, then I have no objection to any other matter being taken up by the Senate, provided that it is understood the unanimous-consent agreement for 4 o'clock, March 21, shall be carried out at that time. If the Chair will permit me, this matter was definitely decided by Vice President Sherman, as will be found in the Precedents of the Senate, on page 550. An inquiry was made of him similar to this, and if the Chair will permit me, I will read what then occurred:

In reply to an inquiry as to whether a certain bill might be made the unfinished business—

The VICE PRESIDENT (Mr. Sherman) said: It could, by action of the Senate, be made the unfinished business. There is no question about that. It could be made the unfinished business by the action of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. That would displace the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT (Mr. Sherman). Certainly, as the unfinished business; but it would not annul this unanimous-consent agreement that on a particular day it be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is in a position to rule if there is anything to rule upon.

Mr. SWANSON. I could not hear the statement of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to the Chair that a mere expression of opinion by the Chair would accomplish no purpose until the question was in such a condition that an appeal might be taken from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Chair will permit me, I simply make the parliamentary inquiry, as is frequently done, as to how the Chair would feel disposed to rule concerning the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered into if some measure other than the armor-plant bill should be the unfinished business at 4 o'clock on March 21, 1916?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Prior to the last Congress it was the understanding of the Chair that a unanimous-consent agreement was a mere "gentleman's agreement." The Chair thinks such an agreement was never violated, but it might have been violated, as there was no rule which provided for its enforcement. The rules were amended at the last Congress and the following clause was inserted:

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the presiding officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present; and when a unanimous consent is thus given the same shall operate as the order of the Senate, but any unanimous consent may be revoked by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed above upon one day's notice.

That, the Chair thinks, changes the parliamentary status of unanimous-consent agreements as theretofore ordinarily understood. The Chair believes that when a unanimous-consent agreement has once been entered into it operates as an order of the Senate and that it must be faithfully lived up to, unless, by unanimous consent, it is revoked upon one day's prior notice.

It seems that in the absence of the present occupant of the chair the following unanimous-consent agreement was entered into:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock p. m., on Tuesday, March 21, 1916, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 1417, to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., on said day (Mar. 21, 1916), no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Under clause 3 of Rule XII, the Chair is of the opinion that this unanimous-consent agreement, unless set aside in accordance with the manner prescribed in said clause 3 of Rule XII, will be in force and effect, and it will be the duty of the presiding officer at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, March 21, 1916, to call up the bill named in the unanimous-consent agreement and have it proceed through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition and to limit argument to five minutes upon the bill itself and five minutes upon any amendment that may be offered thereto.

It will be observed that there is nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement which provides that the present unfinished business shall remain the unfinished business of the Senate from the time of the entering into of the unanimous-consent agreement until the hour has arrived at which the voting is to take place. The Chair is of the opinion that the unanimous-consent agreement, unless set aside in the manner provided by the rules of the Senate, will be in full force and effect at the hour of 4 o'clock on the 21st day of March, 1916, and that from this time until that time it is the right of the Senate to proceed, either with the present unfinished business or any other bill that it may choose to consider under the rules of the Senate.

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I feel that I ought to say that I have no disposition to hinder the consideration of the unfinished business or to hinder the laying aside of the unfinished business by unanimous consent or to hinder the consideration of any other business, the power-site bill, or any other bill, saving only Senate resolution 107. In view of the assurance given by my colleague touching Senate resolution 107, I shall interpose no objection to other business being taken up.

Mr. OWEN. I did not clearly understand what my colleague said, my attention being diverted at that moment.

Mr. GORE. My statement was that I have no disposition to hinder the consideration of the unfinished business or to hinder the laying aside of the unfinished business by unanimous consent for the consideration of any other measure, other than Senate resolution 107, and that I should interpose no objection to the laying aside of the unfinished business to take up the power-site bill, which I understand is the proposition, in view of the assurance given the Senate by my colleague touching resolution 107, to the effect that he would not ask the Senate to take up that resolution on account of the pressure of a number of important public measures for consideration.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the public business is of such urgent character, involving the water-power bill, a great conservation measure, and many other matters of very great national consequence, such as national preparedness, the rural-credits bill, and many others which are waiting to be considered by the Senate, that I do not feel willing at this time to press Senate resolution 107, because it would lead to an unjustifiable consumption of the time of the Senate, for which I am unwilling to be responsible. The Osage resolution relating only to private interests in a controversy between the Osage Council and certain of their tenants who seek a remedy at our hands I do not feel that I would be justified at this time in taking up further the time of the Senate and of the country to discuss it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute before we leave the resolution?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the resolution under discussion, but I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Interior that was sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and also a part of the proceedings of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OIL LANDS IN THE OSAGE RESERVATION—STATEMENT OF HON. CATO SELLS, COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Commissioner SELLS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have now to read the report of the Secretary of the Interior on the resolution. It is addressed to Senator ASHURST as chairman of the committee, and is as follows:

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of January 8, requesting my views on Senate concurrent resolution No. 4 introduced on January 5 by Senator OLIVER, the purpose of which is to request the Secretary of the Interior—

"'To refrain from making any disposition of such quarter-section units of the lands of the Osage Reservation in the State of Oklahoma, as have been developed by the Barnsdall Oil Co. and are now producing oil, save the portions thereof which have been accepted by said company for lease to be made direct to it until further action thereon by Congress; and that said lands after the expiration of the term of the existing lease may continue to be operated by the said sublessee; the money arising from the oil produced therefrom after payment of expenses and royalty to be held in a Federal depositary to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior pending further action by Congress.'

"The effect of this resolution the adoption of which is opposed by the Osage Indians, would be—

"To nullify to a large extent the regulations promulgated about five months ago for the leasing of these lands upon recommendations made by the Osage Tribal Council, and after extensive hearings and an exhaustive study of the question from all angles.

"To permit the Barnsdall Oil Co. to hold indefinitely certain producing oil lands which will revert to the Indians on March 16, 1916, and leases on which the company may acquire under the regulations of this department provided it will pay the value thereof in competition with others.

"In order to present clearly the matters involved it may be well to recite briefly the principal events connected with the leasing of the Osage lands for oil and gas purposes which gave rise to the conditions now existing, before discussing specifically the interests of the Barnsdall Oil Co.

EXECUTION AND RENEWAL OF SO-CALLED FOSTER LEASE.

"On March 16, 1896, the Osage Tribe, through its council, acting under the general provision contained in section 3 of the act of February 18, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 794, 795), made an oil and gas mining lease to Edwin B. Foster for the period of 10 years covering the entire reservation of about 1,500,000 acres. The tribal council at the time gave the lessee 'the privilege of renewal for a term of 10 years or more at the expiration thereof, if the results of said lease prove satisfactory.' The lease provided for a royalty of 10 per cent on oil and $50 per annum for each gas well utilized.

"Through several assignments the lease became the property of the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. in April, 1902, and that company subleased portions of the lands in large and small areas to about 150 different sublessees composed of corporations, partnerships, and individuals. As a rule the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. retained the gas rights, subleasing only the oil rights at a royalty in advance of that which it paid to the tribe. In most cases the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. received a royalty of 16⅔ per cent of the oil, in others 15 per cent, and paid 10 per cent to the tribe.

"Prospecting and development were carried on with more or less activity, but it was not until after the property was assigned to the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. and subleased by it that appreciable results were obtained.

PRESENT LAW UNDER WHICH OSAGE LANDS MUST BE LEASED FOR MINING PURPOSES.

"The act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 539), provides for the allotment of lands and division of the funds of the Osage Tribe of Indians. Section 3 (p. 543) reserves to the tribe as a whole all mineral rights in the lands for a period which will expire on April 8, 1931, unless otherwise provided by Congress, and provides that leases for oil, gas, and other minerals 'may be made by the Osage Tribe of Indians through its tribal council, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe,' and that the royalties to be paid under any such leases shall be determined by the President.

"It is under this law that we are now proceeding to make new leases to take the place of those which will expire by limitation on March 16, 1916.

APPLICATIONS FOR NEW LEASES.

"Early in 1913 the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. and its sublessees began to urge their claims for a renewal in some form of the leasehold interests held by them under the Foster leases, which at that time had about three years to run. A hearing was had before me on June 4 and 5, 1913, the Osage Tribal Council being present, and all interested were invited to submit their views and to file briefs in support of their contentions. I took the entire matter under advisement and instituted field investigations, which extended over a period of several months, for the purpose of gathering all pertinent information upon which to base intelligent action.

"About the first of 1905 steps were taken by the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. and its sublessees to procure a renewal of the lease, which then had a little more than a year to run. The department would not consent to a renewal on the same terms, and many of the Osage Indians were unfavorable to the proposition. The matter was taken up by the Congress, at which time there was pending proposed legislation to provide for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Tribe, and the Indian appropriation bill, approved on March 3, 1905 (33 Stat. L., 1048–1061), contained a provision which renewed and extended for a period of 10 years from March 16, 1906, the so-called Foster lease, owned by the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co., and all subleases thereof executed on or before December 31, 1904, or executed after that date based upon contracts made prior thereto, which had been or should be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to the extent of 680,000 acres in the aggregate, with the conditions of the original lease except that from and after March 16, 1906, the royalty on gas should be $100 per annum on each gas well instead of $50, as provided in the lease, and that the President should determine the amount of royalty on oil. The royalty on oil was fixed at 12½ per cent, and this rate is now paid to the tribe by the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co.

DEVELOPMENT OF LANDS UNDER FOSTER LEASES.

"Data gathered about January 1, 1915, show that the lands were held by 173 sublessees or their assignees, 23 of whom had done no development work. The smallest tract held under sublease is 40 acres. The largest holdings are those of the Barnsdall Oil Co., which has subleases covering 287,607 acres in its own name, in addition to 49,860 acres held jointly.

"During the existence of the lease to January 1, 1915, there had been drilled 2,666 oil wells, 173 gas wells, and 956 dry holes, a total of 3,795 wells. The production of oil from the reservation during the calendar year 1914 was a little over 9,000,000 barrels.

"During a period of four days beginning March 8, 1915, after the issuance of notice to all the sublessees as well as to prominent oil men and others who had expressed any opinion with respect to the matter, hearings were again had before me at which the Osage Tribal Council was present. All sublessees were invited to express freely their reasons for contending that they should be given new leases, those opposed to the views and contentions of the sublessees, or who had any definite and different plans for the development of the lands, were patiently heard, and those who desired to submit offers or applications for leases were requested to submit them to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and for that purpose the hearings were continued before the commissioner on March 22 and 23, 1915. Further field investigations were had and briefs filed by the sublessees and prominent oil men were carefully studied.

THE RIGHTS OF SUBLESSEES.

"The lease rights of the sublessees will expire March 16, 1916, and they do not base their requests for new leases on legal rights. They assert equitable rights by reason of the investments made and the development work performed. The resolution of the tribal council provided for a renewal of the lease in 1906, but no such provision is contained in either the resolution of the tribe or the act of Congress for a renewal of the present lease, which expires in 1916."

Senator WALSH. As I recall, when the original leases were made in 1896 they contained the provision that the lessees should have the right of renewal for 10 years more; so that at the end of that period, in 1906, apparently they were entitled to a renewal for 10 years more without the necessity of any act of Congress or any appeal to any discretionary body. How is that?

Commissioner SELLS. Perhaps not entitled to it, but a show of right.

Senator WALSH. Entitled by the express provision of the lease.

Senator CURTIS. Excuse me a moment. I think Senator WALSH misunderstood the statement of the commissioner. The original resolution of the council provided that it might be extended for 10 years, but the lease made with the approval of the department provided for no extension whatever, but simply provided that it should expire in 1906.

Senator WALSH. I am very much in error if the previous recital did not require that.

Senator CURTIS. I know that to be a fact.

Commissioner SELLS. The council resolutions in 1896 made provision for renewal.

Senator CURTIS. But not the lease.

Commissioner SELLS. Not the lease. There is no resolution, nor is there any act of Congress which in any manner contemplated a renewal after the expiration of 1916.

Senator WALSH. That is true.

Senator OLIVER. If the commissioner will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that Mr. Barnsdall does not base his claim on any strict legal right. He is relying upon the equities of his case solely.

Commissioner SELLS. I think I have so stated.

Senator WALSH. Will the commissioner kindly tell us if the act under which the original lease was executed in 1896 contemplated a renewal?

Commissioner SELLS. Not the act itself.

Senator WALSH. Did it limit the period to 10 years?

Commissioner SELLS. Yes. [Continues reading:]

"They knew that their leases would expire on March 16, 1916, and it must be assumed that the investments were made with full knowledge of the possibility of not being able to obtain renewals or new leases. However, I realize that large sums of money have been invested in the development of the Osage lands, and in the drafting of the regulations hereafter referred to I have endeavored to recognize the conditions as they exist without sacrificing the rights and interests of the Indians.

REGULATIONS PROMULGATED BY DEPARTMENT BASED ON RECOMMENDATION OF THE TRIBAL COUNCIL.

"After I had heard all parties in interest and had gotten together all available data and information I invited the Osage Council to this city, and after 10 days' conference they presented to me, on June 17, 1915, a unanimous report in the shape of a set of resolutions containing recommendations for the leasing of their lands which I approved and which was subsequently approved by the President as to the rate of royalty.

"In the preparation of regulations to be based on the recommendations of the council I called the sublessees into conference on July 27, 1915, and asked them to submit any suggestions they might wish considered, after which we prepared a tentative draft of regulations and submitted the same to the sublessees at another conference held on August 11, 1915, when the matters were thoroughly discussed and some of the suggestions made by the sublessees were adopted.

"It will therefore be seen that before the final approval of the regulations on August 26, 1915, full consideration was given to every phase of the matters involved as well as to the suggestions of the sublessees."

The regulations provide, among other things, for the elimination of the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. as an intermediary, the leasing of oil and gas rights separately, and the payment of a royalty of one-sixth on both gas and oil, except that where the production from any quarter-section unit averages daily more than 100 barrels per producing well the royalty shall be one-fifth. The principal feature of the regulations, however, as affecting new leases to the sublessees under the Foster lease are—

"That there shall be relinquished to the tribe on March 16, 1916, every quarter-section unit (or fractional part thereof, where the sublease does not cover a full quarter section) which was capable on July 1, 1915, of an average daily production of 25 or more barrels of oil per producing well.

"That, except as to the tracts described in the foregoing, leases may be made direct to the present sublessees covering their present holdings in quarter-section units not exceeding 4,800 acres.

"That all producing lands not leased to the present sublessees and relinquished to the tribe shall be offered for lease at public auction to the highest bidder.

"That each and every person, firm, corporation, and each and every combination of person and firm, person and corporation, firm and corporation, etc., holding approved subleases under the Foster lease shall be considered and treated as a separate and distinct entity independent of his or their holdings with any other sublessee.

"That any such sublessee relinquishing producing units to the Osage Tribe shall be permitted to bid for such units at the public sale (to be held Feb. 15, 1916), and any such properties so acquired shall not be considered a part of his 4,800 acres.

"That the sublessees be notified of the terms upon which new leases may be made, and should any sublessees neglect or decline to file with the superintendent of the Osage Agency his acceptance of such terms on or before August 1, 1915 (subsequently extended to Sept. 1, 1915), the lands upon which he might otherwise acquire a new lease by so filing his acceptance shall be offered for lease to the highest bidder."

Copies of the resolutions and of the regulations are inclosed.

At about the time prospecting in the Osage Reservation indicated that oil and gas would probably be found in paying quantities the Congress passed laws authorizing the Cherokee and Creek allottees to lease their lands for certain purposes, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. In the course of drafting regulations to govern the leasing under those laws hearings were had with the oil operators, and it was determined that 4,800 acres should be the maximum holdings of any one lessee of such lands for oil and gas mining. The purpose of this maximum was to prevent such an acreage being acquired by any one lessee as would tend to monopoly, and the rule has been uniformly applied by the department since then in the leasing of restricted Indian lands for oil mining. It has been found that this requirement has worked for the benefit of the oil industry, and it is now generally approved by the large majority of operators. Therefore in considering conditions to be applied to the new leases of Osage lands it was thought that a rule which had worked so satisfactorily in the Five Civilized Tribes and elsewhere should be applied to the Osage as far as practicable.

HOLDINGS OF T. N. BARNSDALL AND BARNSDALL OIL CO. IN OSAGE RESERVATION.

In addition to his holdings of oil and gases leases in the Five Civilized Tribes, it appears that in 1904 T. N. Barnsdall became interested in the Osage oil lands and purchased from sublessees of the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. or their assignees leasehold interests of considerable acreage. In 1906 Mr. Barnsdall organized the Barnsdall Oil Co. and assigned to that company all his interests in the Osage Reservation. All of the stock of the Barnsdall Oil Co. was issued to T. S. Barnsdall, except sufficient to qualify directors. The following statement shows the acreage in which the Barnsdall Oil Co. is interested, either wholly or in part, and the development thereon:

OPERATIONS OF BARNSDALL OIL CO.

"After the incorporation of the Barnsdall Oil Co. Mr. Barnsdall borrowed from the Standard Oil Co. the sum of $7,500,000 and as security therefor pledged all his holdings in the capital stock of the Barnsdall Oil Co., 95,013 shares of the par value of $100 each, in addition to a great many other securities. I am informed that on June 1, 1915, the balance owing to the Standard Oil Co. so secured was $5,913,534.50.

"The properties of the Barnsdall Oil Co. are being developed and operated under the direction of L. W. Young, jr., first vice president and general manager of the company, and the representative of the Standard Oil Co. All the oil produced has been sold to the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., which is generally conceded to be a connection of the Standard Oil Co. Under the term of the deed of trust the Standard Oil Co. has the right to operate the properties by its representative until the entire loan shall have been repaid, not only that part put into the Barnsdall Oil Co.'s properties, but also that expended in the development of other enterprises controlled by T. N. Barnsdall.

BARNSDALL OIL CO.'S ACCEPTANCE.

"The Barnsdall Oil Co. filed with the superintendent of the Osage Agency its acceptance of the resolutions of the Osage Council adopted June 17, 1915, and of the regulations of the department approved in accordance therewith. This acceptance, a copy of which is inclosed, was executed on behalf of the company by its vice president and assistant secretary on August 28, 1915, as follows:

"'Now, therefore, the undersigned, Barnsdall Oil Co., for itself as to all leases as to which it holds the entire interest, and for itself and for its partners as to all leases which are held by it in conjunction with others, does hereby accept said resolution of the Osage Tribal Council dated June 17, 1915, and the terms upon which said new leases may be made.'

"The letter of Vice President L. W. Young, jr., of the Barnsdall Oil Co., accompanying the acceptance states that the same is filed under protest, but it will be observed no mention of protest is made in said resolution. Later the company filed with the superintendent a list of the lands on which it desired new leases, to take effect March 17, 1916, and we proceeded to appraise the equipment on and to list the units to be relinquished to the tribe for sale at public auction on February 15, 1916. Advertisements have gone out to the press and the printing of descriptive circulars had been ordered. It is generally known among oil men that these properties are to be offered for sale and many inquiries have been made with reference thereto.

INVESTMENT OF T. N. BARNSDALL AND THE BARNSDALL OIL CO. IN OSAGE LANDS.

"The Barnsdall Oil Co. holds about one-half of the area covered by the Foster lease, it has drilled a little less than one-third of the total number of wells, and is producing oil from a little less than one-third of the producing acreage on the 160-acre unit basis.

"In the early part of February, 1915, the sublessees were asked to furnish certain information with respect to their operations, including a statement showing the money and property paid for the sublease with the gross expense of development and operations. In the statement submitted by the Barnsdall Oil Co. it is said: 'The properties actually cost Mr. Barnsdall for the purpose of the leases, and the developing and equipping same, $2,372,660.42 in excess of oil sold, which with 6 per cent interest amounted to $4,178,504.15 on January 1, 1915. Crediting him with the dividends paid by Barnsdall Oil Co., amounting to $2,701,322.72, and allowing interest to date on this amount of $330,000, totaling $3,031,322.72, would leave the Barnsdall oil properties still owing Mr. Barnsdall $1,147,181.41.'

ACREAGE BARNSDALL OIL CO. AND ASSOCIATES MAY ACQUIRE WITHOUT ENTERING BIDDING.

"The Barnsdall Oil Co. may select from its present holdings 4,800 acres and be given a lease thereon, without competition and without compensation to the tribe, except the payment of royalties and rentals as provided by the regulations. It may be safely assumed that in selecting this 4,800 acres the company will take those units which are producing the greatest amount of oil, exclusive of the 25-barrel units which must be relinquished to the tribe. Originally it was intended to limit the holdings of each sublessee strictly to 4,800 acres, but as a concession to operators who have joint and several interests a liberal interpretation of the rule was agreed upon, which permits each combination to be considered as a separate entity. The following table shows the acreage which the Barnsdall Oil Co. and its associates may acquire without competition and without the payment of any bonus or consideration other than the rents, royalties, and covenants provided in the regulations and leases:

Sublessee.	Developed acreage.	Undeveloped acreage.
Barnsdall Oil Co., entire interest	4,800
Barnsdall Oil Co., 49 per cent; L. Greulich, 51 per cent		480
Barnsdall Oil Co., one-third; Frost, one-third; Brennan, one-third	320	1,200
Barnsdall Oil Co., 51 per cent; Imp. Osage Dev. Co., 49 per cent	960	1,080
Barnsdall Oil Co., two-thirds; H. L. Jouffriou, one-half		1,280
Barnsdall Oil Co., one-half; W. T. Leahy, one-half		640
Barnsdall Oil Co., 55 per cent; J. F. Moffett, 45 per cent		640
Barnsdall Oil Co., three-fourths; F. E. Miller, one-fourth		640
Barnsdall Oil Co., one-half; Neenah Oil Co., one-half	160	3,040
Barnsdall Oil Co., 55 per cent; Osage Dev. Co., 45 per cent	160	4,640
Barnsdall Oil Co., fifteen-sixteenths; J. E. Sonne, one-sixteenth	1,920	2,880
Barnsdall Oil Co., 55 per cent		960
Barnsdall Oil Co., three-fourths; Stillwell, one-fourth		1,600
Barnsdall Oil Co., 60 per cent; Walker & Wagner, 40 per cent		640
Barnsdall Oil Co., one-half; Wash. Oil Co., one-half		4,160
Barnsdall Oil Co., one-half; Wilson, one-half		640

"In addition to a new lease direct to the Barnsdall Oil Co. in its own name, covering 4,800 acres of producing oil lands, that company and its associates will be given new leases on 3,520 acres of producing and 24,520 acres of nonproducing lands, the total of both producing and nonproducing lands on which the Barnsdall Oil Co. will have interests under new leases without competition being 32,840 acres.

"The Barnsdall Oil Co. will relinquish to the tribe at the expiration of the Foster lease 95 quarter-section producing units. According to figures furnished by that company as of July 1, 1915, these units contain 394 producing wells with a total average daily production of about 3,565 barrels of oil. The total average daily production of the Barnsdall Oil Co. for the month of November, 1915, was 8,975 barrels. It may be assumed that the production during November on the tracts to be relinquished to the tribe has not increased since July 1, 1915. Therefore this company and its associates will obtain new leases on tracts with a daily average production of 5,410 barrels of oil.

BARNSDALL OIL CO. MAY ACQUIRE ALL LANDS AFFECTED BY THE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION BY COMPETING THEREFOR.

"As a further concession to the operators who will release producing units to the tribe on the expiration of the Foster lease, our regulations permit those operators to enter the bidding and compete for the lands so relinquished and to purchase new leases thereon independent of the 4,800 acres which they may otherwise acquire. Thus the Barnsdall Oil Co. may acquire, under the procedure set out in our regulations, all the producing lands which it will be required to relinquish to the tribe and which are the subject of the concurrent resolution.

"The equipment is to be appraised on the units to be relinquished to the tribe, and if satisfactory to the sublessee the equipment will be offered for sale with the lease at the public auction. Should the appraisement of equipment not be satisfactory, the unit will be sold without equipment, in which event the sublessee may thereafter remove the same, except the casing in the wells, for which the sublessee will be paid. Should no bid be received for any such developed unit equaling the appraised value of the equipment where offered for sale, or should no bid be received for a lease on a unit where the equipment is not to be sold, the present sublessee will be permitted to continue the operation of such unit under the terms of the regulations. If a new lease and the equipment on any producing unit is sold to a person other than the sublessee, the latter will be paid the money received for the equipment.

INDIANS OPPOSED TO FURTHER CONCESSIONS.

"It is needless to say that the council would not consent to permitting Mr. Barnsdall to hold the developed tracts which are the subject of the concurrent resolution unless he will purchase the same in competition with others.

"I consider that the Osage Tribe is fully entitled to what it may be able to realize from the sale of the producing units to be released at the expiration of the Foster lease.

"I am opposed to granting special concessions such as the Oliver resolution would involve. The Barnsdall Oil Co. should be held to our regulations the same as any other sublessee.

"The apparent purpose of this resolution is that the Barnsdall Oil Co. may secure valuable property belonging to the Osage Tribe in excess of the acreage permitted under the tribal resolution and the regulations of this department without competition and without compensation.

"It was not possible to have made a greater effort to be fair to all interests in the preparations of our regulations than was made. This fact is one which must be borne in mind in considering this matter. The Foster lease covered 880,000 acres. The Barnsdall Oil Co., as a sublessee, secured the rights under that lease to approximately 340,000 acres; the remaining 340,000 acres were leased from the assignee of Foster in large and small blocks, ranging from 40 acres to more than 25,000 acres, to 172 sublessees. Twenty of those sublessees, who have done no development work, or have drilled dry holes, have apparently abandoned their holdings and have filed no acceptance of the council resolutions. Four sublessees, in addition to the Barnsdall Oil Co., and who are associated with this company in the Osage lands, have accepted under protest. This indicates our regulations have been generally satisfactory to all, except Mr. Barnsdall and a few of his associates.

"Two other things have been sought throughout the long negotiations in this matter. First, that the Indians should receive the full royalty for their oil. It was offensive to me that the Indians should be paid but one-eighth royalty, while the white men who were the sublessees actually paid a royalty of one-sixth. This difference of one twenty-fourth amounted to many thousands of dollars in a year, and went to the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co., the assignee of the original grantee (E. B. Foster) as a pure bonus for having secured the lease from Congress. The new leases will give the Indians the full one-sixth.

"The second thing sought was the establishment of a reasonable maximum acreage so as to guard against monopoly. This was a public concern of large importance. How large an acreage should one concern be allowed to hold? The rule as to Indian lands generally in Oklahoma, as shown above, was 4,800 Why should not this rule be applied to the Barnsdall Oil Co.? When this was suggested the Barnsdall Oil Co. urged that they should be allowed more than 4,800 acres because they had interests with many minor companies. Elsewhere in Oklahoma as to Indian lands these holdings would have been counted against the Barnsdall Oil Co. It would have been allowed no interest in any other company if it had 4,800 acres of its own. The conclusion was reached, however, that this rule should be modified or waived so that the Barnsdall Oil Co. could hold 4,800 acres of its own choosing, plus all of its interests in other companies, which amounts to approximately 28,040.

"Then came another appeal, that inasmuch as the Indian owners of these lands insisted that the units producing 25 or more barrels of oil per well per day, and the surplus developed lands, should be put up at public auction; that they (the Barnsdall Oil Co.) be not deprived of an opportunity to bid these in. This was allowed also, so that the Barnsdall Oil Co. may to-day hold 4,800 acres, plus its interests in other companies, amounting to 28,040 acres, plus whatever acreage it bids in at public auction, and as to the latter it should know its value better than anyone else. And it should be remembered that all improvements made by the Barnsdall Oil Co. are to be paid for by any new lessee. I have thought this adjustment fair.

"Cordially, yours,

"FRANKLIN K. LANE.

COPY OF THE LA FOLLETTE RESOLUTION.

"Whereas the Department of the Interior through its representatives at the Osage Agency in Oklahoma, having in view the fact that the present lessees of the oil rights of the Osage Indians would terminate on March 16, 1916, and that it was the desire of the lessees to secure a renewal of said leases, did, on the 11th day of December, 1914, write said lessees as follows:

"'Schedules are being prepared to be used at the hearing as to the renewal of the so-called Foster lease before the honorable Secretary of the Interior in Washington in the immediate future. It is the desire of this office that each lessee be given full credit for all the development done upon the acreage charged to him up to December 31, 1914. To this end, we suggest that a statement be mailed to this office at once (if no change will take place between now and December 31) showing the dry oil and gas, and the gas wells in service commercially, if any, upon each separate lot or section or division thereof, charged to you.

"'The renewal, if any, will be based upon the records as shown by this office. It therefore behooves each lessee that we are furnished with the correct information at once;' and

"Whereas it appears that at that time the leased area of the Osage lands was divided into 'lots' varying in area from a small acreage to several sections, which lots were, when leased singly, the smallest unit for development, and where more than one of these lots were included in a lease, the total leased area became the unit of development; and

"Whereas thereafter and on February 22, 1915, the said representatives of the Department of the Interior wrote the various lessees who had within their leased areas 'lots' upon which no development of any character had been made, calling attention to these undeveloped lots and then stating:

"'You are advised that the records in this office show that no development of any character has been performed upon the above-described property, and in order that the office may be fully informed, will you please advise me by March 1, 1915, if possible, why this tract has not been tested;' and

"Whereas on August 26, 1915, the Secretary of the Interior promulgated 'regulations to cover the leasing of lands in the Osage Indian Reservation in Oklahoma for oil and gas mining purposes,' among which regulations was the following:

"'2. Any such sublessee who in good faith shall have made an effort prior to October 1, 1915, to develop any lands under the Foster lease for oil, and shall have drilled one or more wells thereon, even though such wells may have resulted in dry holes, will be granted a new oil lease on the expiration of the Foster lease on March 16, 1916, under the conditions set forth in sections 3 to 9 of these regulations, provided acceptance of the resolution of the tribal council dated June 17, 1915, is filed with the superintendent not later than September 1, 1915.

"'3. Any such sublessee may select from his present holdings and obtain an oil lease embracing not to exceed 4,800 acres of land in quarter-section units according to the public survey, or in fractional parts of such units where the present sublease does not cover a full quarter section, units the producing wells of which were capable of averaging 25 or more barrels of oil per day on July 1, 1915, which units shall be released to the Osage Tribe on March 16, 1916, together with all other producing and nonproducing properties held by each such sublessee in excess of 4,800 acres; and

"Whereas on October 30, 1915, the representative of the Interior Department at the Osage Agency in Oklahoma wrote these various lessees notifying them that he was in receipt of a telegram from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as follows:

"'Section 9 of Osage regulations amended to permit filing plats not later than December 1 as to undedveloped lands;' and

"Whereas many of said lessees have, pursuant to these various suggestions and invitations by the representatives of the Interior Department, drilled wells and made other developments within the past two years upon the apparently reasonable presumption that their leases would be so extended as to include their oil production; and

"Whereas because under these rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior their leases will be limited to 4,800 acres composed of developed units of 160 acres each, the wells of which shall not average more than 25 barrels per day, some of them are compelled to abandon producing territory which has been recently developed by them; and

"Whereas under the statements contained in the above-quoted correspondence and under the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior they were led to believe that they would be granted an extension of their leases; and

"Whereas they have accepted in many instances the terms prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, have executed leases, and have complied with all of the requirements set forth in the rules and regulations and are, notwithstanding the fact that no leases have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, possessed of certain equities deserving protection: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate and further action by Congress the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to make no sale of oil leases and to make no oil leases on the lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma except to the present lessees, and for only the areas now held by them, and for a term of five years from and after March 15, 1916, said leases to be upon a royalty of one-sixth and to be made and operated under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; such royalties to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Osage Nation of Indians: Provided, That such leases and possession thereunder shall not be made the basis for further equities at the termination of the period therein prescribed; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, through a subcommittee of five members to be chosen by it, be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to fully investigate the methods of controlling and marketing the oil production of the Osage Reservation in Oklahoma and all affairs connected therewith, and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during vacation; and said committee shall make full and complete report, together with its recommendation, to the Senate. The necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin. Call the roll, Mr. Clerk.

Senator PAGE. Does this protect the present holders of the leases there?

Senator LA FOLLETTE. It does.

Senator CURTIS. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will call the roll.

The yea-and-nay vote on the resolution introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] resulted—yeas 8, nays 3, as follows:

Yeas (8): Husting, La Follette, Gronna, Curtis, Clapp, Page, Fall, and Owen.

Nays (3): Ashurst, Walsh, and Lane.

So the resolution was agreed to.

OIL LANDS IN THE OSAGE RESERVATION.

(Wednesday, Feb. 23, 1916.)

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 11.30 o'clock a. m. for the further consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 4, relating to the disposition of units of lands of the Osage Reservation in the State of Oklahoma.

Present: Senators ASHURST (chairman), OWEN, LANE, MYERS, CURTIS, PAGE, and GRONNA.

The committee having temporarily suspended the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill—

Senator PAGE. Can we not have a hearing on your resolution, Senator OWEN, until Senator CLAPP comes?

Senator OWEN. When he was present we considered this matter.

Senator CURTIS. He approved it. He voted for it yesterday.

Senator PAGE. Let us hear it.

"That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to refrain for a period of two years, or until further action by Congress, from making any disposition by lease or sale of such quarter-section units of the lands on the Osage Reservation in the State of Oklahoma as have been developed by oil operators either under leases or subleases and are now producing oil, except such units as are now held by lessees who have accepted the terms of the resolution of the Osage Council of June 17, 1915, for leases to be made direct to them. Said developed lands thus withheld from lease, after the expiration of the term of the existing oil lease, may continue to be operated by the present oil operators who are now in possession of and operating the same at a royalty of one-sixth on all leases of quarter-section units when the average production is less than 25 barrels per well per day and a royalty of one-fifth on all such leases when the average production exceeds 25 barrels per well per day, all royalties to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Osage Nation of Indians."

Senator OWEN. The effect of that is simply to suspend the sale of these leases which were to be sold on February 15 until the committee should see fit to act further.

Senator CURTIS. On the 16,000 acres?

Senator OWEN. Yes.

Senator PAGE. For the purpose of developing whether we are to have any opposition or not, I move to approve that resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is by the Senator from Vermont that we adopt and agree to the resolution just read by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Senator WALSH. The 15th of February is now passed.

Senator CURTIS. It was suspended until we might consider the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. It was suspended until the 1st of March.

Senator GRONNA. I was going to suggest that it ought to provide in there "not less than one-sixth," and "not less than one-fifth." It may be that conditions will arise that would be perfectly just to all parties concerned. I move as an amendment that the words "not less" be inserted in both instances.

Senator OWEN. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

Senator GRONNA. An amendment was handed to me as drawn by Senator LA FOLLETTE. Before we vote on this, since that has been referred to me, I think it is only just to Senator LA FOLLETTE that it should be read, if the Clerk will kindly read it.

"Therefore be it resolved, That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate and further action by Congress, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to make no sale of oil leases and to make no oil leases on the lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma except to the present lessees, and for only the areas now held by them and for a term of five years from and after March 16, 1916; said leases to be upon the basis of a rental of $1 per acre for all undeveloped 160-acre units and the best obtainable royalty, in no case, however, to be less than one-sixth, and upon all leases the acreage of which shall exceed 4,800 acres, and in the case of 160-acre units, the wells of which have an average production of 25 or more barrels of oil per day the royalty shall be at not less than one-fifth. Said leases to contain all the covenants and agreements of the so-called Foster lease of March 16, 1896, not inconsistent with the provisions of this resolution and said leases to be made and operated under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, such royalties to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the Osage Nation of Indians: Provided, That such leases and possession thereunder, shall not be made the basis for further equities as the termination of the period therein prescribed: And be it further

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, through a subcommittee of five members to be chosen by it, and it hereby is authorized and directed to fully investigate the methods of controlling and marketing the oil production of the Osage Reservation in Oklahoma and all affairs connected therewith, and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during vacation; and said committee shall make full and complete report, together with its recommendation to the Senate. The necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

Senator CURTIS. You also in your resolution provide for the investigation?

Senator OWEN. Yes. I would be glad to accept the amendment providing for this committee of five under the conditions named by Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Senator GRONNA. I was going to suggest if we adopt anything at all we ought to provide for some means whereby——

Senator OWEN. I accept this amendment.

Senator CURTIS. It is then only to be offered as a substitute for the first part of the La Follette amendment?

Senator OWEN. Yes; leaving the investigation to the committee of five under condition stipulated by Senator LA FOLLETTE. I move, therefore, this substitute, with the addition of the provision for the committee of five, as proposed by Senator LA FOLLETTE, be made the action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any discussion on that motion? If not, the secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted:

Yeas, 7, as follows: Senators MYERS, OWEN, PITTMAN, LEWIS, PAGE, FALL, CURTIS.

Nays, as follows: Senators ASHURST, GRONNA, WALSH.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes are 7, the nays 3, and the committee orders the resolution reported in accordance therewith.

Senator WALSH. Will you now read the resolution as amended?

(The clerk read the following Owen resolution:)

"That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to refrain for a period of two years or until further action by Congress from making any disposition, by lease or sale, of such quarter-section units of the lands on the Osage Reservation, in the State of Oklahoma, as have been developed by oil operators either under leases or subleases and are now producing oil, except such units as are now held by lessees who have accepted the terms of the resolution of the Osage Council of June 17, 1915, for leases to be made direct to them. Said developed lands thus withheld from lease, after the expiration of the term of the existing oil lease, may continue to be operated by the present oil operators who are now in possession of and operating the same at a royalty of not less than one-sixth on all leases of quarter-section units when the average production is less than 25 barrels per well per day and a royalty of not less than one-fifth on all such leases when the average production exceeds 25 barrels per well per day, all royalties to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Osage Nation of Indians: And be it further

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, through a subcommittee of five members to be chosen by it, be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to fully investigate the methods of controlling and marketing the oil production of the Osage Reservation in Oklahoma and all affairs connected therewith, and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during vacation; and said committee shall make full and complete report, together with its recommendation, to the Senate. The necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma. I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma does not particularly desire to press the consideration of the Osage Indian land-leasing bill.

Mr. OWEN. I stated that I would not press the matter upon the attention of the Senate because of the urgency of other matters of great national importance which are pending. The Osage resolution being only a private bill, in a way, relating to private interests in the State of Oklahoma, and a controversy between certain men who developed oil in the Osage country and the Osages themselves, I do not feel that I ought to take up the time of the Senate with it when these other national matters are pressing which are of greater consequence.

Mr. SIMMONS. I entirely agree with the Senator, and I wish to ask him a question. The Senator referred a moment ago to the rural-credits bill.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am of the opinion that no legislation proposed at this session of Congress is of greater public importance, or of interest to a greater number of people in this country, than the rural-credits bill. In view of the ruling of the Chair in reference to the armor-plate bill, I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, who is the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, if there is any reason why we can not take up the rural-credits bill and make it the unfinished business of the Senate and proceed to its consideration?

Mr. OWEN. I know of no reason. I should greatly desire to see that done; but I rather thought that because the water-power bill was so recently in the mind of the Senate, because of the discussion which has taken place, the Senate would probably prefer to dispose of the bill coming over from the House at this time.

The rural-credits bill has been before my committee now since two years and a half ago, when I appointed a subcommittee especially to consider that matter, and it has taken them two years and more to perfect finally a bill which we are willing to offer to the Senate. That bill is now before the Senate. It is a matter affecting millions of people and of great public consequence. It was in view of the pendency of that bill that I did not feel that I ought to take up this local matter and take the time of the Senate with it when my colleague was unwilling to have the Senate come to a vote and was willing to consume the time of the Senate in discussing it indefinitely, as he can do under the rules of the Senate, if I insisted upon its consideration.

For that reason I do not now feel disposed to press Senate resolution 107, but do feel that the Senate would be altogether justified in taking up the rural-credits bill for immediate disposition. It is a matter of vast consequence to the whole country, and it is not a partisan matter. It is a matter that appeals to both Republicans and Democrats alike, and the committees which considered it did not consider it as a partisan question. They considered it as an American question and dealt with it in the broadest possible aspect; and I should greatly like to see the matter disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, while I do not desire to make any comparison between the power bill and the rural-credits bill—I think they are both bills of very great importance—of course, if there is any special and particular reason why the power bill should have prior consideration, I should not feel like interposing any objection. But unless there is some particular reason why the Senator should yield in favor of that bill, I trust that he will now put the rural-credits bill before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield to me?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from North Carolina, I believe, expresses a hope that the Senator from Oklahoma will have the rural-credits bill put before the Senate. If the Senator from Oklahoma does not see fit to press his oil-leasing resolution, I do not think it is in the power of the Senator from Oklahoma to say what bill shall be placed before the Senate, although I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for his very kindly and generous reference to the water-power bill, he having taken particular pains to say that he had that bill in his mind as one to be considered by the Senate.

I asked some minutes ago that House bill 408 be laid before the Senate. Other things intervened in such a manner that that request has not yet been acted upon; but I intended, as soon as the Senator from Oklahoma had given up the floor, to follow it up by moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill, providing the Senator from Oklahoma did not wish to press his resolution.

In reply to the Senator from North Carolina, I will say that I think there are many good reasons why the Senate should proceed to the consideration of House bill 408. The Senate has just been on that subject. It has spent five or six weeks in exhaustive discussion of it, which was not confined solely to the particular bill under discussion—the Shields power bill—but every phase of water-power development was discussed; and I think it would be the appropriate and the logical thing now to take up the other water-power bill and resume the discussion where it was left off. I think it could be expedited and could be finished in a much shorter time than it could if the subject should grow cold, and rural-credits legislation, or some other legislation, should intervene, and this matter should be taken up in a month or six weeks later. In that event we should have it all to go over again.

Therefore, if I may have the floor now, if the Senator from Oklahoma does not wish to occupy it further——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MYERS (continuing). I desire to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has been waiting quite a while.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is pretty well understood on this side of the Chamber that our Democratic friends will make a program for the Senate, and that whatever bills they agree to have taken up and passed will undoubtedly be considered. That is always the privilege of the majority and we are not disposed to find any fault with that. But I wish to ask the leaders on the other side of the Chamber whether or not in their contemplation of the business of this session it has occurred to them that the minority might be considered to the extent of having the tariff laws of the United States revised during this session and in that way reduce the deficit in the Treasury?

Mr. KERN. I did not quite understand the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The inquiry was whether or not, in the contemplation of our Democratic friends, constituting the majority, who will make up the program from time to time, they have thought it would be a courteous matter, so far as the minority is concerned, to have the tariff laws of the United States considered with a view of revising them at this session?

Mr. KERN. That has not been considered at all by the majority up to this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I commend my suggestion to the prayerful consideration of the Senator from Indiana and his colleagues.

WATER-POWER SITES.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, just for a question, before he makes his motion?

Mr. MYERS. I withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask a question for information. What length of time does the Senator expect that the bill, if placed before the Senate, will consume in its discussion before a final vote is had?

Mr. MYERS. That is very hard to answer, but I think it ought to be concluded in a few days. I think we ought to be able to get a vote on it before the armor-plate bill comes up by unanimous consent, to be voted on, on the 21st instant.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course the Senator recognizes that there are some principles involved in that bill upon which there is a very wide and very marked and very firm difference of opinion.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I know that, but there is more than a week yet until the 21st, and it seems to me we ought to finish the discussion in less than a week if we stay at it steadily.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is optimistic.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Is a motion in order to lay some bill before the Senate for consideration, in view of the pending unfinished business, except by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has so ruled—that a motion to lay it before the Senate is in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And that displaces the existing unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That displaces the existing unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senators from the Western States could only agree about what they want upon this water-power matter, the balance of us would be very much disposed to support them. I have been trying to find out what to do to cooperate with the Senators from the Western States, but about the time I determine I am helping them to do what they want to do I meet another portion of the western Senators who seem to want exactly the reverse.

Now, I am going to vote for the motion to take up this matter, and let us hear from the Senators from the Western States and see if we can find out what they want.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator hear?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will stay and listen.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to inform the Senator that if he does we will entertain him for a great many weeks.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before I yield the floor, Mr. President, I wish to say that I hope they will give us their views and let us vote as between them. If they can not agree as to what they want for all the States, it seems to me they might be able to put the bill in a shape where it could be made applicable to some States in one way and to some States in another way.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I spoke of a principle. A principle can not be made applicable to one State in one way and to another State in another. A policy may.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are differences of opinion as to the principle. I can understand why the Senator from Montana might think one principle——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; the Senator is mistaken. There is no difference as to the principle. One insists that the Government owns and controls the water, and the other insists that the Government neither owns nor controls the water. There is an irreconcilable difference of principle.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I disclaim that for the sponsors of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment, Mr. President. I understand that the Government owns the land adjacent to the water in certain States. In those States where the land is owned by individuals rather than by the Government, the riparian rights control the water incident to the ownership of the land. I suppose the Senators from some——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to finish what I am saying before the Senator interrupts me, and I do not yield to him just now.

What I wished to say was that I am extremely anxious to support what Senators want for their States, and I am simply embarrassed to know what we ought to do. I have a bill that I am anxious to press, but there are Senators from the Western States who think we have treated them badly in not yielding to them; and I am going to yield again, hoping that the time may come when some one will feel that he should yield to the judicial bill, in which I am interested, and I hope the Senators will be able to bring their discussion to a conclusion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire it understood that I have made my motion, and that debate on it is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no; debate is in order, because it is after 2 o'clock.

SEVERAL SENATORS. A recess was taken.

Mr. MYERS. Then I acknowledge that I was mistaken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The debate is in order, but it is not very pertinent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, as to that there is a difference of opinion, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. REED. I am quite sure there is some confusion regarding the parliamentary situation.

The Senate has agreed by unanimous consent to vote on the armor-plate bill on the 21st of March. That bill is the unfinished business. The Chair, I understand, has ruled that notwithstanding the unanimous-consent agreement and the pendency of the armor-plate bill as unfinished business a motion may now be made and properly entertained to take up for consideration the water-power bill. If that motion is carried, will it displace the armor-plate bill, so as to nullify the agreement to vote on the 21st, even though we shall again hereafter by motion restore the armor-plate bill as unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri evidently was not in when the Chair ruled.

Mr. REED. I was not, when the Chair ruled on that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled, in answer to a parliamentary inquiry—and the Chair regrets that the ruling was made at that time, because there was no opportunity at that time to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and thus get the opinion of the Senate—that there was not anything in the unanimous-consent agreement that required the unfinished business, as then pending, to remain the unfinished business of the Senate, and that, regardless of what the Senate may do in the interim, at 4 o'clock on the 21st of March the vote begins on the armor-plate bill.

Mr. REED. Suppose in the meantime no motion has been carried to again take up the armor-plate bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule says that a unanimous-consent agreement is an order of the Senate when it is once entered into. Like every other order of the Senate, when the hour arrives the Chair lays the bill automatically before the Senate.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to have a clear understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish the Senator from Montana to understand, from anything I have said, that I am in the slightest unfriendly to his bill. I stated that if there were any special reason why it should be taken up ahead of the rural-credits bill, I should make no objection. I think the Senator from Montana has stated a very substantial reason why we should proceed to the consideration of the water-power bill, and I shall take very great pleasure in voting for his motion. I shall do that the more so because I am assured by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that as soon as that bill is out of the way, if it is taken up, and the armor-plate bill is out of the way, he will urge upon the Senate the consideration of the rural-credits bill. I should be in favor of it against the judicial bill, though I am in favor of that, because I do not think the judicial bill is of quite as much importance to the country at large as the rural-credits bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I did not misunderstand at all the motive of the Senator from North Carolina. I had no misapprehension about it; and I in turn wish to say that I am very heartily in favor of the rural-credits legislation as well as in favor of the water-power bill which I have asked to have laid before the Senate.

I am in favor of the bill which I ask the Senate to consider. I am also in favor of the bill which is sponsored by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but we can not do all these things at one time.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have gotten out of the Senator's way. Let him proceed.

Mr. MYERS. I intend to support all these measures in time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to give the reason for my vote.

The rural-credits bill is ready to be taken up by the Senate. I know of no substantial opposition to it in its present shape. There will undoubtedly be some amendments offered, and very likely the bill will be largely improved on the floor of the Senate.

I had intended, with the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, to move the consideration of the rural-credits bill after the armor-plate bill was disposed of, but I feel that the time of the Senate would be saved if we should consider the second water-power bill at this time. It is one of the great conservation measures and should be passed at this session. I agree with the Senator from Montana that the immediate consideration of that bill would probably save the time of the Senate.

I shall therefore vote in favor of the motion of the Senator from Montana. If, however, that motion fails, I shall then move to take up for consideration the rural-credits bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill which has been reported by the Senator from Montana and I am opposed to its consideration. It is the most disastrous in its effect upon the Rocky Mountain States of any bill that has been presented to the Congress of the United States for 20 years.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] said in his argument the other day in favor of taking up this bill that we should give the Western States a show; that the South had been given consideration of their water-power bill, and that the Western States wanted an opportunity to have their bill presented.

I want to say, Mr. President, that the western Senators are not in favor of this bill, and if anyone here thinks that the majority of the western Senators are in favor of this measure he is sadly mistaken.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me for just a word?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Colorado referred to my remark the other day, in my desperate effort to get up this bill, in which I referred to it as being particularly of interest to the Southern States. I wish to amend those remarks by substituting the East. I understand that the bill is of great importance and large interest to the Northeast as well as the South and to all parts of the country east of the Rocky Mountain States. I have no desire to make a subsectional issue of the matter, but as the East has had consideration in a bill which, if it becomes a law, will develop pretty nearly everything east of the Rocky Mountain States, I feel that the Rocky Mountain States should have consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. As long as the Senator from Montana has included the Eastern States, and I represent a small part of that section, I wish to say that, as far as the State of Maine, which I have the honor to represent in part, is concerned, we would prefer that no legislation of the kind presented in the Shields water-power bill should ever be enacted. I supposed it was for the benefit of the Western States, the States represented by the Senators from Montana—particularly to develop the water powers of Montana—and the States of Oregon and Washington. We need no Federal legislation to develop the water powers of New England. We have done it under our State laws, and we would prefer to do it again as we have done it in the past.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that the Senator from Maine voted for the Shields water-power bill. If he does not want the work to be done under it, I do not understand that kind of legislation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish to ask the Senator whether I am correct. I thought when the Shields water-power bill was fought out so well and passed by this body it was so comprehensive in its character that it took in everything in sight, and even that which was out of sight.

Now, I am a little curious to know what the purpose of the bill of the Senator from Montana is. I suppose it is to clean up all the water powers that the Shields bill did not take up, and that what little is left to the people will be taken up and taken care of and well husbanded and doled out to the western people as a great favor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In answer to the Senator from New Jersey, I will say that this bill proposes, on the part of the Federal Government, to confiscate the waters of the States in the Rocky Mountain region.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is, what is left by the Shields bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; what was left by that bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is what I thought.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They did not confiscate by the Shields bill, but they are proposing now to confiscate all these powers. For that reason I am very much opposed to the measure.

I want to say in relation to the statement made by the Senator from Montana in urging the Senators in this Chamber at that time to give the Western States a show, so that the western Senators could have the opportunity to get legislation that would remedy the conditions out there, that a majority of the Senators—three-fourths, in my judgment, of the Senators—from the Rocky Mountain States are opposed to this bill, and very strongly opposed to it. I want to call over the States and see whether there is any denial of it.

I say the State of Colorado is absolutely opposed by its two Senators to this bill.

I say that the State of New Mexico is opposed to it by its two Senators.

I say that the State of Wyoming, by its two Senators, is opposed to this bill.

I say that the State of Idaho, with its two Senators, is opposed to the bill.

I say that the State of Utah, with its two Senators, is opposed to the bill, and as to the balance, at least one in each State, in my judgment, is opposed to it, except the Senators from the State of Montana.

Now, if you are going to get this bill up as a favor to the western Senators or as a favor to the Western States, I want to say that it is not a favor, and consequently the bill ought not to be considered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado if he is justified in making that statement in reference to the two Senators from Oregon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oregon may not, but I understood that one of the Senators from Oregon is opposed to it.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the Senator if he takes the responsibility of making that statement in reference to the State of Nevada?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have so understood, but I may be mistaken as to that. However, it is true as to the majority of the States.

But, Mr. President, if this is to be a great favor to the Western States I want to direct attention to the action taken by the governors of the Rocky Mountain States. There was a meeting of the governors of the Western States in April, 1914, in the city of Denver for the very purpose of considering these leasing measures, and they passed a resolution which condemned the policy which is proposed of making the leasing system by the Federal Government govern in those States.

Again, there was a meeting of governors in September, 1914, in the city of Salt Lake, Utah, and there they passed a resolution in favor of an entry system and against the system of leasing.

Not only that, but we had another one in the city of Portland, Oreg., last September, in which the governors sent representatives there for the purpose of determining what should be the policy of the Government, and they condemned the water-power bill on the ground that it was not for the best interest of the West.

So, it seems to me, when you are asking for consideration of this bill as a favor to the western end of this country, and that we should take it up and consider it because the West is interested in it and wants it considered, it is plain and clear that the West does not want this legislation.

I want to go a little further, inasmuch as the Senator from Montana seems to think that the Representatives of the Western States and the sentiment of the Western States is in favor of this bill. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in both the Republican State convention and the Democratic State convention this bill was condemned. I want to read to you what the platform of the Democratic Party in 1912, upon which I was elected, contained.

Mr. MYERS. National or State?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Colorado State convention. The national platform contained nothing in the nature of an approval of a leasing proposition. In the conventions of the Democratic and Republican national parties they have never attempted to use the word "leasing" with respect either to the public domain or the water power. Here was that platform of the Colorado Democratic Party of 1912:

> We denounce the policy of the Republican administration, which, having retarded our development, now proposes to withdraw all the remaining agricultural, grazing, and mineral public lands from all forms of entry, with the expressed determination of imposing upon the West a permanent bureaucratic rule and Federal leasing system of all the Government resources within our borders, and thereby disastrously retarding the development of our State and depriving our Commonwealth of its just and constitutional right.

Mr. President, that is the sentiment not only of the Democrats but it is the sentiment of the Republicans out there. What did the Republicans say in their convention of 1912? They said:

> We condemn the policy of extreme conservation inaugurated by President Roosevelt, James A. Garfield, Gifford Pinchot, and other extremists—> and we insist that the public lands and resources of this State should be so administered as to place them in the hands of actual settlers and those who would develop them at the earliest possible moment and without undue and unreasonable restrictions. We are unalterably opposed to the petty and annoying interference by vast numbers of Government employees, operating under bureaus at Washington, as such conduct prevents and has prevented the development of the mining resources of the country, has retarded the utilization of its water powers, and has driven settlers to seek homes in Canada and elsewhere.

This is the Republican State platform of Colorado—

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this was adopted in the Republican convention without a dissenting voice:

> We affirm that the water of every natural stream within this State is the property of her people and that the right to use the same within the State for beneficial purposes is unlimited, and we condemn the efforts of the Reclamation Service and the Interior Department to prevent the utilization of the waters of our streams by the people of this State as unwarranted, unjust, and unauthorized by law.

If it is claimed we should give consideration to this bill because the people of the West want it, what do you think of those planks in both the State Democratic and Republican platforms? And in the Colorado State platforms of 1914 there was reiterated the same statement of condemnation.

Mr. President, can the Senators ask for the consideration of this bill as a favor to the Western States in view of that situation? Is it possible that these resolutions which have been passed in conventions mean nothing and that they are not intended to have any bearing or any weight?

Mr. President, various legislatures of the Western States have spoken, and they have not spoken by divided voice, but unanimously.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I thought I might possibly cut short the debate by asking the Senator if an amendment were offered to this bill to the effect that it should not be applicable to the State of Colorado, would he feel that he could permit its consideration?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would feel perfectly willing to consider that, if you would put in the bill that the withdrawal orders and revocable permits which are upon the water sites in the State of Colorado should be repealed and that the United States shall get for its land there just what in a condemnation suit, if it were private property, it would bring. If we have that I am perfectly willing, so far as the State of Colorado is concerned.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest to my colleague that if he will offer an amendment confining the bill to Montana, we may consider it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, one moment. The Senator from Montana is perfectly willing to do so. Furthermore, the Senator from Montana is perfectly willing that anyone else who desires to have the operation of the bill extended to his State may do so. So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing that the bill should be confined in its operations to the State of Montana, and the Senators from the West could determine this very quickly. If any Senator from the West does not want the bill to operate as to his State I am perfectly willing that it may be amended in that regard.

Mr. President, I am simply asking that the Senator from Colorado shall not play the dog in the manger. We want this bill to open up the resources of our State. We beg of you to let us do it, and to let us do it under the provisions of a bill that we are entirely satisfied with. If the Senators from Colorado do not want this bill applicable to their State, I am very sure none of us would want to impose it upon them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming rose.

Mr. WALSH. And exactly the same way with reference to the State of Wyoming. A letter was submitted to the Public Lands Committee from the governor of the State of Wyoming, or from the ex-governor of the State, giving some views about this bill that do not entirely conform with those of the Senator. I take it that the Senators will state here if they do not want the bill applicable to the State of Wyoming it is perfectly satisfactory that it should not be.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield for a question. I do not yield for any purpose that will take me off the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator has mentioned the State of Wyoming. I would not be willing for this bill to pass even if Wyoming were exempted from what I think are the ill effects of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just one moment. I am not aware that the governor of my State has taken any different view of this matter than I now express. The governor of my State is a man who is thoroughly in accord with the best development of the State and of the entire West. He did write a letter in regard to another bill pending before the committee. He may have written one in regard to this, but if so it has not been called to my attention.

I do not believe this is a bill that can be separated into parts or into localities. There is involved in it the question of the right of the Government or the right of the State to control the waters which have been given to the States, which are theirs by sovereign rights and backed by solemn act of Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming before he takes his seat whether the Legislature of the State of Wyoming at its last session did not pass a resolution condemning this very water-power bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It has done so on more than one occasion.

Mr. WALSH. I think I have had a direct answer from the Senator from Colorado. He answers my question in the negative. I understand him also to say that if an amendment is offered that the bill shall be applicable only to the State of Montana he will still oppose it, and I understand that to be the attitude of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no; distinctly not.

Mr. WALSH. So far as I am concerned I shall be very glad to offer that amendment, and I will ask my friends to vote for it. If the Senators from Nevada want this bill applicable to their States, they can include Nevada. If the Senators from Oregon want it applicable to their States—and I have no doubt in the world they do—it will be made applicable to Oregon. Why is not that right? Why should anyone object to that?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I know something of the capacity of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in drawing his stipulations and taking care of a particular side of a lawsuit, and I would be afraid to enter into a stipulation with the Senator, for the reason that I would know when he should have finished the bill in reference to Montana he would have established a precedent which Idaho and Wyoming and Colorado could not contend against after it had been once established. This is one of those measures which can not be confined, as a matter of fact, to a State, although the bill upon its face should purport to do so.

I am not particularly opposed to taking up this measure, although I am strenuously opposed to the measure in its present form. It has occurred to me that we might possibly hammer it into some kind of shape which would be agreeable to me, but I would be utterly opposed to establishing even a precedent out of applying it to Montana, which would inevitably control Idaho in the long run.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] will permit me just a word, I will say that I think the Senator from Idaho has expressed the right sentiment about this matter. Why should it not be possible to whip this measure into some satisfactory shape? Why should it not be taken up for consideration and put in such shape as the Senate thinks expresses the principle applicable to all of these States? We are now talking about whether the bill shall be taken up. I agree with the Senator that I had a very great deal rather see a bill passed applicable to all the States that represents the sentiment of the Senate as to what should be done; but I proposed what I did propose, thinking that it could not possibly be resisted by my esteemed friend the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I wish to say that I think I express the sentiment of the great majority of the people of my State when I say that the bill ought to be made applicable to Oregon, and not only to Oregon but to the Northwestern States that are in the process of development.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not understand what was said by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I wanted to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, a question. I understand that lately in the committee there have been some amendments agreed to as committee amendments. I wanted to ask the Senator whether or not that is a fact, and whether, if so, such amendments have been reported to the Senate? If they have not been, could they not be reported to the Senate and put in such shape so that we might know what they are?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's question I will say that after the bill was reported out of the Senate Committee on Public Lands there were some further amendments taken up and considered by that committee and adopted as committee amendments, representing the sense of the committee. Whenever the bill is laid before the Senate—I hardly considered this an opportune time to do that—but whenever the bill is laid before the Senate for discussion and consideration, I had intended the very first thing to offer these further amendments, to ask that they be printed and lie over, and go to the desks of Senators so that they might be considered.

Mr. JONES. Would not the Senator, in fact, do that now, whether the bill shall be taken up or not, so as to have the amendments printed and lie on the table, that Senators might see what they are?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has the floor right now. I had supposed that whenever the bill was taken up for consideration it would be debated for at least several days, and at the outset I should offer the committee amendments and ask to have them printed. I am willng to do that at any time for the information of Senators. If the Senator from Washington wishes it, as soon as the Senator from Colorado has concluded his remarks, and as soon as I can get the floor, I will offer the amendments and ask to have them printed.

Mr. JONES. I should like to see the amendments in print as soon as possible. I understand from what I have been told with reference to the character of the amendments that they would put this bill in substantially the same form and shape as the water-power bill that we passed a few days ago.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think that is true; but, nevertheless, for the information of Senators I shall be glad to offer the amendments and have them printed at the first opportunity.

Mr. JONES. That is what I should like the Senator to do, in order that we might get at the facts.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not object to having this bill considered as applicable to the State of Montana alone when the Senators from that State are favorable to it, except that it involves an important principle that is applicable to all of the States. It involves the sovereign right of the States, and it is the distinct attempt and determination of this legislation to take away from the States their sovereign power to deal with and control the flowing waters of the streams of the State. I should be very sorry to see any precedent of that kind established with respect to any of the States. But for that consideration I should have no objection at all to the bill being taken up as applicable to one or more States, not, however, including my own.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, in answer to the statement that it is a favor to the Western States to call this measure up for consideration in the Senate, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Legislature of the State of Colorado has at every session for the last 10 years condemned in the strongest possible language the whole leasing system, and particularly the water-power measure. I call attention to this language, which was used by the general assembly of that State:

> We deny that it is right or advisable for the Federal Government to retain the title to and lease the public lands for any purpose.
> Nearly all of our metalliferous lands have been included in the forest reserves, since which time not a single important mining camp has been opened. The unwarranted interference by the Forest Service is largely responsible for the falling off of millions of dollars in the annual metal output. The man who is willing to put his labor and money into the development of a mining claim is the person best fitted to classify the land and should be permitted to acquire it.
> We venture the assertion that if 40 years ago the forest reserves had been established neither Leadville nor Cripple Creek nor a score of other mining camps would have been discovered and developed.
>
> The private-owned land in the State is scattered promiscuously among the Federal-owned land, and there can be no hope of harmonious action or good feeling through the intermingled double jurisdiction over our territory. * * *
> The Government purposes, as a landlord, to go into almost every kind of a business within the State on untaxed property in competition with private-owned and taxed property. The public business does not need to pay expenses, but the owner of the private property must pay taxes to make up the loss of his Federal competitor. The Federal Government engaging in business as a proprietor must necessarily occupy a contractual relation with the citizen, under which the Government may enforce its contract against the citizen, whereas the citizen may not enforce his contract against the Government.

Mr. President, that is the expression of the Colorado General Assembly of 1913. That was the legislature which, in express terms, condemned the Ferris leasing bill and the Ferris water-power bill; so if it is now pleaded that something ought to be done because the West wants it, I must say that the sentiment of my part of the West is almost unanimous to the effect that it does not want this measure. For that reason, Mr. President, it seems to me that instead of now taking up this bill we should take up a bill which both political parties are in favor of, namely, the rural-credits bill. There are other bills upon the calendar that are pressing which will not take up so much time. For that reason we ought to say now that we will not consider this bill.

So far as Montana is concerned, personally, with relation to its Senators and as an accommodation to them, I should very much like to accede to their request; but the bill involves a great principle. It involves the principle of whether we are going to let the United States seize and take the waters which belong to the States, and which the Supreme Court of the United States has time and again decided that the States own, and confiscate them to the Government's own desires. For these reasons, Mr. President, I am opposed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not at this time attempt to discuss the merits or demerits of the measure which the motion seeks to lay before the Senate for consideration; but, inasmuch as that discussion must necessarily follow, and follow at very great length the Senate's determination to consider the bill, and inasmuch as there are so many matters of tremendously more importance soon to crowd upon the consideration of this body to the exclusion of everything else, I deem it my duty as an opponent of this measure to give some reasons why I do not think the Senate should adopted the motion of the Senator from Montana.

It is true, Mr. President, as outlined by the discussion which accompanied the statement of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] that there is a division of opinion—a very honest, earnest, sincere division of opinion—among Senators of the public domain States with regard to the necessity or the expediency of this bill. It is true that those who advocate it do so upon very strong grounds. There is no doubt about their sincerity, about their earnest belief in its importance, in its value, and in its necessity; and that very fact makes it a very disagreeable duty upon my part even to seemingly oppose what they desire so much for their own States. I must assume, although there is record evidence to the contrary, that these Senators represent the constituencies which sent them here in their advocacy of this or some similar measure; but we are equally earnest and equally sincere in our conviction that the bill contains elements which are disastrous not only to the present but to the future welfare and prospertiy of the people of the arid and semi-arid States. We are equally earnest in our belief that the bill is based upon a vicious principle, one which transforms the Government of the United States into a gigantic landlord, an absentee landlord at that, with its headquarters and its agencies thousands of miles from its domain, to which applications of all kinds must be made under the provisions of this bill and to which all disputes must be referred, thereby transferring practically the seat of determination of these matters regarding our own domain to a far-distant city, coupled with an expense, a tedium and a waste of time which means bankruptcy and ruin to the small operator and the citizen of limited means.

We believe, too, Mr. President, that the bill is utterly irreconcilable with the fundamental proposition that the waters of the natural streams in the arid States belong to the people of those States subject to appropriation for useful purposes, among which is the identical appropriation which the Government, by virtue of its power to do so, proposes, arbitrarily, to make by legislative enactment and which must necessarily result in the re-absorption by the Government of these interests which are absolutely necessary to the physical existence of the populations in those sections of the country and which, therefore, they have been endowed with by recognition of a condition which made it imperviously essential. For these reasons, Mr. President, we are going to oppose this bill, if it comes before the Senate, to the best of our ability.

We have had one water-power bill before the Senate. I think it was laid before this body some time in January. It was discussed and then rediscussed and then discussed again. Then it was discussed, as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] suggests, backwards, and after the lapse of about six weeks a vote was obtained upon it, and the instant the vote was announced it was vetoed throughout in the papers of the United States by the most distinguished of all conservationists. So I assume that the bill is dead, notwithstanding the fact——

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is his name?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Pinchot. So that I imagine the bill is dead, notwithstanding this waste of valuable time.

If the Senate only wants to discuss water questions at this session, if it only desires to devote its valuable time to the consideration of another bill of similar character between now and the 4th of next July, and perhaps longer, of course it will take this measure up and proceed to do so; but where, by antediluvian rules and customs and practices, this body is still, very much to my regret, endowed with the power of constant and unlimited obstruction and where a measure of this kind strikes, as I believe, at the very vitals of the constituency which I represent, I deem it fair, and only fair, to say to the Senate that the optimism of my distinguished friend from Montana with regard to an early vote on this bill is doomed to radical and far-reaching disappointment. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. President, I believe that when a man uses any weapon in debate, either in opposition or in advocacy, he might just as well acknowledge what that weapon is; and, so long as there be weapons that are legitimate, I know of no reason why every Member of this body can not, until they are taken away from him, resort to them whenever necessary, and I will say to my very good friend from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that at any time during this discussion which I am outlining the Senate is willing to table or otherwise dispose of the consideration of the bill and take up the amendment of the rules so as to make that possible, I will yield the floor with a great deal of pleasure. But "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Now, Mr. President, if the Senate wants to take up this measuse, in view of the attitude which we occupy regarding it, I suppose it has the power to do so; but those who desire to accomplish something else at this session must not complain if they find that as the days go by we are making no progress that they were not sufficiently warned in advance.

Mr. President, I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Montana upon the table, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Norris	Smoot
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Oliver	Stone
Borah	Hollis	Page	Sutherland
Brandegee	James	Pittman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Thompson
Chilton	Jones	Pomerene	Underwood
Clapp	Kenyon	Robinson	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Shafroth	Walsh
Colt	Lane	Sheppard	Warren
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Sherman	Weeks
du Pont	Lippitt	Simmons	Williams
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Gore	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to state that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is detained on account of illness.

Mr. KERN. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] on official business. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] moves to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on laying on the table the motion of the Senator from Montana. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name mas called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is absent, and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], but I believe if he were present he would vote as I would vote on this question; therefore I taken the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am released from my pair on this particular question. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DU PONT. As I have a general pair with that Senator and do not know how he would vote on this question, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this motion, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—9.

Clark, Wyo.	Shafroth	Smoot	Sutherland
Clarke, Ark.	Smith, Ariz.	Stone	Thomas
Norris

NAYS—56.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Myers	Simmons
Bankhead	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Tillman
Dillingham	La Follette	Phelan

So Mr. THOMAS's motion to lay Mr. MYERS's motion on the table was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on the motion to lay on the table I voted "nay"—in the first place, on general principles, and, secondly, for other reasons peculiar to the situation. But before the motion to take up this measure is passed upon I desire to say a few words.

Undoubtedly it will take much time to dispose of this bill. Under any circumstances it would take considerable time and, feeling as some Senators do, it will necessarily take much more time than would ordinarily obtain with reference to disposing of even so important a measure. There are a great many people in our section of the country—whether a majority or not, I do not know, and I am not concerned to know—who believe that this measure is inimical to the interests of that particular section of the country which some of us seek in part to represent. Whether a majority so think or not, I think, in its present form, it would be a detriment to the public-land States, and must therefore oppose it. It is not alone objectionable because of the details of the bill, but because of the fundamental principles and by reason of the fundamental questions which are involved. It involves, as we think, the question of the efficiency of these States to take care of their own interests and to utilize their natural resources to their best advantage. That being true, of course, there will be some difficulty in limiting the time within which we can dispose of this question.

In connection with this matter may I be permitted, without assuming any undue authority in this Chamber, to call attention to the situation which confronts us here in the matter of legislation? Some three and one-half or four months of the session have now passed, and no appropriation bill, as yet, has passed this body. The supply bills are all yet to be disposed of. If we should start in to-morrow to consider the supply bills and give to them the attention which they ought to have, we could not pass them before the 1st of June. It would take from now until the time when the national conventions shall meet to dispose of the appropriation bills if we should give them the attention which they ought to have. But when we consider furthermore that these appropriation bills will involve some very important and new phases of legislation, we could hardly hope to dispose of them even by that time. After the appropriation bills are disposed of we will have, if we are to take up the question at all, the question of a program of preparedness, as it is popularly called; and when are we going to take up that matter for consideration? We have also the important measure of rural credits—a bill now on the calendar.

If I had my way, or could have any influence in the directing of affairs in the Chamber, I would close down the legislative program at this time to all legislation except supply bills and the program for preparedness until these matters were finished. If the President of the United States be correct in the message which he carried to the people some few weeks ago, the Congress of the United States is sadly derelict in its duty in meeting a most momentous situation. We have been in session, as I say, for some three or four months, and we have been warned from the beginning, in the graphic language of the President, that the conflagration which is going on in Europe is sending its sparks constantly on to this hemisphere, and no man knows from one day until another what emergency this country will have to face with reference to this condition of affairs. We can not shape these bills relating to preparedness in a week, if we do our duty, nor in a month, if we meet the situation as it ought to be met. It will take not only days but weeks, and if it were properly disposed of it would take months, to formulate and shape the policy of this country to meet the situation which has been so pronouncedly presented to the country by the President.

Either one of two things must be true—that the President was sadly in error as to the real situation which confronts us, or that the Congress of the United States is sadly in error in failing to respond to the appeal of the President, or certainly that condition must obtain which is only less unfortunate, and that is that the Executive and the Congress are wholly at disagreement with reference to the importance of this subject.

I do not disapprove of the action which the President has taken with reference to pursuing those who invaded the territory of the United States a few days ago and took the lives of a number of our citizens. In so far as that expedition is confined to the pursuit of a fugitive who has taken the lives of American citizens, I think the President is not only right as a matter of policy but is well within his constitutional rights. I say in so far as his effort is confined to the pursuit of the men who committed the outrage I think his action right both in policy and in power. Therefore I do not mean by anything I may say to leave even an inference of criticism upon the action of the President with regard to this matter. I have been so anxious to see something done with reference to protecting American rights in Mexico that I have no word but commendation to any action, though, in my judgment, belated, looking to extending full protection to our people.

But, Mr. President, while I concede the President has performed his duty in seeking to run down these murderers, yet no man knows the consequences which may follow or flow from that act. No one can measure the probabilities which may arise from the fact that we are now invading Mexico, although solely and only for the purpose of arresting and punishing those who have taken the lives of American citizens, and that alone. The difficulty is that we may have started a train of events over which we can not exercise control. Whatever the consequences may be, we are under the most solemn obligations to be prepared to meet them.

We must take into consideration, Mr. President, that all Central America is interested in this proposition, and we must take into consideration, notwithstanding the views expressed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] a day or two ago, that Central America feels uneasy whenever she sees moving in that direction the power of the United States, whatever its professed purpose may be. From the press dispatches as they come to us this morning it would look as if the authority which we have recognized in a technical way would not be friendly to our entry into Mexico, even for the purposes which we proclaim in regard to our mission. If that be true, how are we going to meet the situation when the men who are in charge of the situation, the military experts, tell us that it will take 50,000 men in Mexico and 100,000 men upon the border to take care of the situation? Shall we confine our efforts for the next 10 days or 20 days or 30 days in discussing this measure, or whatever measures they may be, which can wait? Or shall we take advantage of the situation and avail ourselves of the opportunity which has been presented here, and once and for all set ourselves about to outline and consummate and bring to a final conclusion a program of preparedness which shall show to the country that Congress and the President are in accord with reference to these matters and that we are neither uninformed as to the possible peril which confronts us nor unwilling to meet it? Either this program of preparedness is vital and the need of its enactment is eminent or a most signal injustice has been done to the American people by the statements which have been so solemnly made to them.

It seems to me, Mr. President, while I am opposed to this bill, even if I were in favor of it, I would not want to bring forward and put into discussion here a matter which will take the next 15 or 20 days to dispose of, when all these other matters pressing for a conclusion are up for consideration, if we will only give them consideration.

Mr. President, I am not averse to meeting this issue when we can meet it properly and under proper circumstances. As I have said, I am opposed to the measure in its present form. I realize that the West needs some legislation. We need some kind of legislation which will release the imprisoned energies of that great northwestern empire, and it has been a hard matter for me to determine at times whether we should stand upon the fundamental principles which seem to me to be involved or whether we should yield to the call of expediency and consent to legislation in order that capital might go to that great northwestern country and begin to perform its service for the benefit of those who are there. But in settling this matter I should like to feel that neither time nor circumstances shall hamper us in the full determination and the full solution of this problem, because there can be no doubt that this legislation affects us in a most vital way. In a most important way it deals with our resources and it reaches down and takes hold of those things upon which a State must be built if it is to be built at all.

I suggest to Senators who are urging the bill that they might well defer its consideration until another time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not see that there is any pressing nor immediate necessity before this body for the consideration of a preparedness measure at this time. There is no preparedness measure; there is no measure for the increase of the efficiency of the Army or the Navy which is now before this body of which I know anything except the armor-plate bill, which has been temporarily laid aside by its own sponsor.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill a few days ago, I understand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. MYERS. He introduced a bill which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is in the committee now. The bill was simply introduced and referred to the committee, but it will be in some time the latter part of this week, or next week, I think.

Mr. BORAH. I misinterpreted the notice in the papers.

Mr. MYERS. That has been the only preparedness measure of which I know which has been even introduced in this body except the armor-plate bill, which, as I said, has been reported out, and which has voluntarily been laid aside by its own sponsor. It may be weeks until the efficiency bill which the Committee on Military Affairs has under consideration, which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] introduced, is reported back to the Senate. I do not know how long it will be. We must be doing something in the meantime, and it is up to the Senate to decide what it will proceed to consider.

I for one do not agree with the Senator from Idaho that all our internal needs and all our legislation regarding the welfare of the people of this country should be shelved and laid aside for the sole purpose of devoting our entire energies to voting money for the increase of the Army and Navy; to provide for increases and vote the money to meet those increases.

As far as the situation in Mexico is concerned we have, I believe, 100,000 troops in our Regular Army, besides all of the National Guard upon which to call. We have at least one of the foremost navies of the world. If those resources are not sufficient to capture a few bandits in Mexico or to meet whatever emergency may arise in Mexico or which may meet us in the contending factions down there, I think there is very little use in providing a larger Army and Navy. If we can not cope with the condition down there, if it is of such a character that it can not be depended upon for that purpose and for that emergency, then we might just as well not provide any more Army and Navy, because it would not be worth anything when we got it. We were in war with Mexico once. This country has had one war with Mexico, and all the South American countries did not rally to the aid and defense of that country. I have no fear of anything of that kind occurring now. I do not believe the people of this country are demanding to-day that the Congress of the United States should lay aside all other business and devote its entire time and attention to further taxing the people and voting away the money for the increase of the Army and Navy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is aware of the fact that the President entertained such views about this matter, and the dilatoriness of Congress undoubtedly, that he felt called upon to do what he had never done before since he has been Chief Executive, and that was to make an appeal to the country. He has gone out and made his plea to the country. I do not know all the facts which are in his possession with reference to foreign affairs and foreign conditions, but I know enough to know that we delude ourselves if we suppose that we are dwelling here in the utmost security, and I know enough to know that we are not prepared to take care of a serious situation which he informs us may arise at any time with reference to our foreign affairs.

I refer not only to Mexico, but I refer to other conditions which it is neither proper nor desirable at this time to discuss, but certainly the Chief Executive would not go to the country and plead for action if he did not himself consider it imperative. Neither am I relying alone upon his statements. I have, as every observing and reflecting man must have, some views and some apprehensions formed from sources well within the reach of all Senators, and practically all citizens.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, we have a larger Army and Navy now than this country has ever had before in its history, I understand. It is true the President of the United States made a trip out through the country to inform the public of all his motives and desires and to arouse public interest in what he believed to be the welfare of the Republic. He had plenty of precedents for that. The only difference between him and other Presidents is that some other Presidents spent practically all the time going over the country and preaching their ideas, and that was the first instance in which the present President of the United States, I believe, did so.

I do not say but that there is truth and merit in what the President said on his recent inland trip to the interior of the country, and that there was wisdom in taking the trip. He informed the country of the condition of affairs and appealed to them for what he deemed to be wise and prudent legislation upon preparedness.

There will be reasonable and conservative preparedness legislation enacted and brought about, I believe, within a reasonable and due time. The committees of Congress are working on it now, and I have no objection to its being expedited reasonably and being taken up in due time and fully and fairly considered when it is ready for consideration by Congress. In the meantime we must have something to do.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. FALL. I was interested in the Senator's statement as to our preparedness. I should like to ask him where the 100,000 men are to whom he refers?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know where they are. You will have to call on the Secretary of War. It has been my information that there are about 100,000 soldiers in the United States Army at the present time. I do not know where they are.

Mr. FALL. Do you think that to-day we have enough soldiers to handle the present condition on the Mexican border?

Mr. MYERS. If we have 100,000, I think it is sufficient to meet the condition on the Mexican border or in Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator's information lead him to believe that we have a quarter of a hundred thousand available?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know how many may be available.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I have no objection to making more available as soon as we can get to it.

Mr. FALL. One more question, and I will yield to the Senator from Oregon. How long does the Senator think it would require to get action on the bill which he is so desirous of getting up?

Mr. MYERS. To have a final vote on it I do not know. I stated in response to an inquiry by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] a little while ago that I thought it ought to be disposed of in a few days. Of course a threat has been made of an unending filibuster, but I do not believe——

Mr. FALL. I do not know that there will be any filibuster, but I can state to the Senator that there will be very serious discussion.

Mr. MYERS. I welcome that.

Mr. FALL. I imagine the Senator will discover that we will require equally as much time to dispose of it as it did to dispose of the Shields bill.

Mr. MYERS. Then all the more reason why we should begin and all the more reason why we should get it done. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that I am heartily in favor of taking up the water-power bill for discussion, because there is nothing pressing before the Senate at this time. But I desire most earnestly to protest against the statement going to the country uncontradicted that we have 100,000 men available for purposes in Mexico or anywhere else. I desire to say that in so far as my knowledge goes we have not even enough to cope with Mexico. We have not only not enough men there, but we have not the material in the way of equipment, rather in the way of aeroplanes and other things that will be absolutely essential for such a warfare as we would be compelled to engage in. It is no child's work, Mr. President, and the statement of the Senator going forth to the people of this country lulls them into a feeling of security when it absolutely does not exist.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the Senator have we not about 96,000 men enrolled in the United States Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Some of them are where it will take 30 days' travel; they are in the Philippines and in China and in Panama, and they are scattered all over the continent. We have not available in this country continental troops to exceed 30,000, and not more than half of that number would be available to deal with Mexico.

I venture to say, Mr. President, that if we think we can go down into Mexico and whip them into order in a few weeks this country will be disappointed. They have a well-trained soldiery there, and can organize an army of from fifty to sixty thousand men at any time. Mr. Villa will be looked upon as the national hero. So far as I am concerned I would not be surprised at all to see every Mexican, the Carranzista force and the Villa force, rally around one standard for the purpose of whipping the United States. I think the statement ought to be carefully weighed before it is made here that we have 100,000 men to cope with Mexico or any other serious situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, allow me to suggest to the Senator also that Mexico to-day has more field guns than the United States. I think Mexico to-day is prepared better with ammunition than the United States. I do not believe we ought to allow the impression to go out uncontradicted that we have 100,000 soldiers to put into Mexico in case of need. If I remember correctly, the total soldiers in the Army, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts, is about 82,000. We have about 10,000 in the Hawaiian Islands; we have some in the Philippine Islands; and I quite agree with the Senator from Oregon that we can not to-day under the present conditions send more than 30,000 soldiers to the Mexican border.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senators are careful about the kind of information that is being sent out to the people of the United States; I think they ought to be equally careful about the kind of information they are sending to the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the Republic of Mexico already knows just as well as the officials of the United States how many field guns we have. That information is found in public documents and reports.

Mr. REED. In other words, the Senator says the Mexicans know more than the American people?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. REED. He is very careful that the American people shall not be informed, but he is not so careful that we shall not furnish information to Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. I spoke of the officials of Mexico only and I spoke of the officials of the United States. I do not think there is any question that the statement I have just made is absolutely correct.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I have yielded to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I understood that the Senator yielded to me.

Mr. MYERS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia in a moment.

Mr. WARREN. I am very glad that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is in his place, as he usually is, to correct erroneous statements as to the size of the Army.

Mr. MYERS. Just permit me to ask what statement have I made that needs correction? I said that I understand there are but 96,000 soldiers in our Army. If that is not true, tell me how many there are.

Mr. WARREN. I am not going to take up that matter just now. The majority party of the Senate, of course, will decide as to when the preparedness bill will be taken up, but I am expecting that majority party to respond to the call of the country whenever the chairman of the Senate Military Committee is able to bring in the Senate military preparedness bill, or when a similar bill comes from the House, and to make it the first business of the Senate from the time it comes in until it passes out, no matter what else may be pressing before the Senate.

In my judgment, while we must have a bill properly prepared—and both Houses have each taken great pains to prepare such a bill—there is no other business before the country as important and imminent as it is to pass a bill reenforcing our Army.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish in just a word to express my sympathy with the views presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Undoubtedly everything should yield when the measures can be brought before us providing for an increase of the Army and an increase of the Navy. There is one measure of importance with those two. It is to provide for auxiliary vessels in connection with the Navy in the shape of a merchant marine. I do not believe there are any measures so important which will come before this Congress as these three. I wish to make this additional suggestion. I do not believe that the Committee on Military Affairs could do us greater service than to bring in a bill providing for the immediate increase of the Army, not waiting for full Army details but providing at once that for the next two years there shall be enlisted a substantial number of men more than doubling the present size of the Army. Their training should be without delay, and therefore I think this portion of the military bill should be passed without delay.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be an authority on military affairs. I said it had been my understanding that there were about 96,000 men enrolled in our Army, and I have not heard that denied. Where they are I do not know. How many of them are available for service I do not know.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator there are more than 96,000.

Mr. MYERS. Then I estimated the number too low.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator made it a little too low. There are only about 25,000 to 30,000 in continental United States. The balance of them are scattered everywhere.

Mr. President, with reference to the suggestion that there has been delay, I wish to say——

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the Senator goes further——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will allow me, I will yield, with the permission of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I give my permission for that purpose, if I may.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if in connection with our punitive expedition into Mexico we could not avail ourselves of the National Guard? I have seen in the papers a great many telegrams sent to the Military Department indicating a readiness and willingness to furnish large forces to assist the United States in its needs in Mexico. If the Senator will pardon me, I suppose they would be regarded as raw troops, and for that reason probably would not be sent on the expedition into Mexico. I will ask the chairman of the committee, if he does not think that for patrol duty along the border State Guard troops could be used almost as well and serve almost as good a purpose as regular soldiers of the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are about 129,000 men in the organized National Guard of the country. There is no question but that they would be available for service in Mexico, but while I have great confidence in their fighting capacity, there is a difference of opinion amongst Army officers as to the number who would be efficient in case of actual service. In any event, they are not trained like Regular soldiers and could not become as effective within a short time as are the Regular soldiers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would they not be as effective for patrol?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They might be effective along the frontier. I differ with the Senator, and I have military authority to sustain me, men who have fought along the frontier all their lives, and some have had more or less experience in Mexico. Where I differ from the Senator is in looking at this proposition as simply chasing a few bandits into Mexico. If that was all there was to do, then we have enough men to do that. The police force of New Orleans or New York could possibly do that. But we are going up against a trained army that has been fighting in Mexico for the last four or five years.

However, I will not discuss that, Mr. President. I am speaking with the permission of the Senator from Montana. What I want to address myself to for just a moment is the suggestion that there has been any neglect on the part of Congress in undertaking to carry out the program of preparedness as was suggested by the distinguished President of the United States. The Military Committee of the Senate and of the House, too, I believe—I know the Senate committee has been in session constantly for 60 days or more, and we have had published the hearings before those committees. The Senator from Missouri spoke about our giving information to Mexico. These hearings are published to the world. There is absolutely not a thing connected with our defenses either on land or water that the German Army does not know; that the Austrian Army does not know; that the French Army does not know. The general staffs of those countries are just as familiar and some of them are more familiar with conditions than are our people themselves. There is not any question about that.

But the committee have not been delinquent in their duty, Mr. President. We could go out and produce and present a bill to Congress in a very few minutes in an emergency that was right on us, but these committees have been undertaking to formulate a bill that would be a reorganization bill, in fact, and place us in a position where we could defend ourselves in case of trouble with any power. We are not in that position, but the Military Committee of the Senate is going to get that bill back here just as soon as it can, probably the latter part of this week or the first of next. Then I shall ask that it be taken up for consideration. Just to let the country know the method that has been followed in the preparation of this Senate bill, I desire to say that for six months I was working on a bill to submit as a basis to the committee for consideration. The committee took that up as a basis for the construction of a bill, and then they heard all the Army officers on the subject. They have taken the General Staff's plan of the organization with the basic bill which was submitted by me, and from all these sources they have formulated a bill which meets with pretty general approval. The bill has been presented not as my measure, for I have no pride of authorship as to the bill. In the committee there are some very distinguished old soldiers who understand the situation. It has gone back to that committee and has been referred again to the War Department to report again as to its effectiveness and for reports as to estimates. So the committees of Congress have been constantly at work on this measure for the past two or three months.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, Mr. President, when Senators are giving expression——

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to occupy only about 30 seconds longer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was merely going to remark that when Senators are declaring that there is in Mexico a well-organized army capable of battling against the soldiery of the United States we ought to pause long enough to learn what that army is. We know in the first instance that 75 per cent of the population of Mexico are blanketed Indians, and that not to exceed 2 per cent of that element have been worked into bandits and have followed whatever leader saw fit to take charge of them so long as they could carry on their looting. I do not believe it is going to take 200,000 or 100,000 men to dispose of it. But I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to state where the Mexicans have that wonderful equipment of arms and ammunition that is very much greater than that of the United States? Who furnished it to them and how is it to be used now?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I remember about two years ago when I was trying to get an additional appropriation of $500,000 for the purchase of ammunition for the Army it was opposed by a majority of this Senate and my amendment voted down. At that time, I remember very distinctly, the number of field guns owned by the principal countries of the world was discussed, and I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that Mexico at that time had more field guns than the United States. I can not say whether that condition exists to-day or not. I judge that it would. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that if they have increased the number of guns they possessed at that time, I believe they have been purchased from the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will cut all this short, so far as I am concerned, by simply saying that the matter is wholly in the hands of the Senate. It is not a question of what bill we shall take up to-morrow or at some other time, but what bill we shall take up right now, this minute, until we have some other business before us to attend to. I repeat, the matter is wholly in the hands of the Senate. Whenever a preparedness measure is reported to the Senate by any committee it will be in the power of a majority of Senators, should they so desire, to displace any and all other business and take that up. That will be a matter which can be decided when the time comes.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is no doubt but what the arms and ammunition in Mexican hands have been largely bought from the United States. There is where we have made mistakes—in raising embargoes and allowing munitions to go across the border. That has been done; that is in the past; that we can not help.

Now, as to the character of the opponents, which my friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] alluded to——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will ask my friend from Wyoming if he will not let me conclude what I wish to say. I will yield the floor if I can have about half a minute, and I should like to have a chance to get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Then I will resume my remarks.

Mr. WARREN. I have terminal facilities, and will be through in about two minutes; but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I believe I will beat the Senator to it if I get a chance.

This is a matter wholly in the hands of the Senate. If in the course of 30 minutes or three days or three weeks after this bill is taken up a majority of the Senate desire to take up some other measure it will be in their hands to do so; but if there is going to be a prolonged filibuster upon this bill, if it is going to take weeks, that is all the more reason why we should consider it right now. Therefore I hope the motion to take up the bill will prevail.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate to give the people of this country a false idea with reference to our preparation to meet the exigencies of the situation in Mexico. I think, on the other hand, it would be equally as unfortunate to have the people of Mexico, on account of any statements that have been made in this high tribunal, labor under a false impression about the readiness of the United States to carry out the enterprise now about to be undertaken in that country. I have not myself any question of our readiness, or at least that we can quickly put ourselves in readiness for any eventuality in that country.

I know it is true, Mr. President, that we probably have not now a sufficient supply of ammunition or armament on hand. I mean immediately in the possession of the Government and ready for immediate use by the United States Army. But, Mr. President, as is well known, for more than a year great manufacturing establishments have been in operation in this country making ammuniton and manufacturing all sorts of implements of war, and that those factories, if called upon by the United States Government, are in a condition to immediately supply any deficiency that there may be in our present armament and in our supply of powder and explosives.

It is true that we have a small standing Army available for service in Mexico at this time. I suppose, if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is correct in his statement, that probably we could not muster immediately more than 25,00 or 30,000 regular troops to send into Mexico; but, Mr. President, it would be an error, in my judgment, to underestimate the importance and the value in this connection of our National Guard. They are not only equipped for patrol duty and such other service as our Army must perform along the border, but undoubtedly many of the companies and regiments of this service are fairly well trained, and would give a good account of themselves if assigned to regular field duty. I think they would acquit themselves creditably; and I think it ought not to go to the country, because I believe it is true, that there is the feeling in Congress that the Government is not in a condition to meet the situation that now exists or which may hereafter exist in Mexico in connection with our present controversy with that country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me one moment for a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire to get into any controversy. I simply want to make a suggestion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I very heartily concur in what the Senator from North Carolina has said as to the efficiency of the State militia.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is underestimated in this country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the Senator is entirely right about it.

I merely want to suggest to the Senator that the United States to-day is better equipped in men, ammunition, material, arms, and ships than ever before in the history of the Republic. We have had war with Mexico, we have had war with Spain, and we are better equipped to-day to meet any emergency than we have ever been before. I do not approve of the idea of giving out to the country the suggestion that we are absolutely helpless, while we have spent more money for the purposes of war within the last 10 years than in the same length of time during all the years of the history of the Government. It seems to me that before anything should be said in the discussion of this question there ought to be accurate information ascertained as to the amount of material available—the amount of arms, of guns, and of equipment generally. The discussion of this question in this way, it seems to me, is eminently improper, because it is giving out to the country gross misinformation which ought not to be given out by anybody, especially the United States Senate. I can not conceive of anything more untimely and pernicious than loose talk or imprudent speech in this body about such a delicate question as the question at issue.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope we may have no war with Mexico, and I do not believe we are going to have war with that country; I believe we are going to accomplish our present purposes in that country and retire; but it may be that I am mistaken; it may be that those who agree with me are mistaken about that; I do not know. However that may be, I believe that at present we are sufficiently prepared to do the work that we have immediately in hand and can quickly get ready for any ulterior eventualities.

I do not undertake to say, and nobody in this country would say, if we become engaged in a regular war with Mexico, we shall not have to enlarge our Army as well as call out the National Guard. What I mean to say is that at this time by the use of the National Guard, supplementing our Regular Army, we shall be able to meet the situation down there. I do not wish that the impression shall go either to Mexico or the people of the United States that we are in such a weak and impotent condition of unpreparedness in this present emergency as may be implied by the remarks of some Senators here upon the floor to-day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Reenforcing the statement just made by the Senator from North Carolina, if he will permit me, I have the report of the Secretary of War in my hands, and I will read this portion of it, on page 17:

> At the present time appropriations are available for the maintenance of an Army and all of the accessory employees thereof aggregating 5,023 officers and 102,985 enlisted men. Of these, 67,000 men are mobile army troops, 20,000 are coast-defense troops, and the balance are Hospital Corps, quartermaster men, and other employees of that character. Of this total number, about 29,000 are on service outside continental United States, leaving therein about 40,000 mobile-army troops and about 13,000 coast-defense troops. Deductions must be made from these latter figures of sufficient troops to garrison the oversea possessions, which will materially reduce each of the totals above mentioned
> The Organized Militia in the various States has an enrollment of approximately 129,000 men and officers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator from New Jersey believes that with the mobile army of the United States, supplemented by the National Guard, if the situation required it, we could readily bring into the field between 75,000 and 100,000 men?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; that is correct, according to the deductions from this report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I certainly do not underestimate the importance of speed in connection with our work of preparation not only on account of the trouble that we now have with Mexico but on account of probably the greater troubles in which we may become involved across the water. I believe that everything ought to be done that can be done in order to put ourselves in a state of adequate preparedness; but, Mr. President, it is very well known that you can not hastily prepare legislation dealing with great questions of this sort, with the many perplexing problems that arise in connection with them. It takes time for that.

The fact that the military bill and the naval bill have not yet been reported to the Senate does not indicate any disagreement between the Senate and the President upon the question of preparedness. It merely emphasizes the fact that the committees have found these difficult questions with which to deal, and they have been dealing with them with caution, prudence, and deliberation.

I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is a member of that committee and who for a long time, I believe, was the chairman of that committee, if he discovered any disposition on the part of the membership of that committee, while the matter was before it, to delay the preparations and the introduction of the bill as speedily as it could be prudently done?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator appeals to me and, of course, I must answer. I will say that the chairman of that committee has always been present at its meetings; he has never failed in his attendance. There have been other Members who have also been diligent in their attendance, but, unfortunately, a number of Members have not been able to attend—some not at all and others very infrequently—some of them probably because of their duties on other committees and some of them possibly because they take no interest in the subject matter. But there has been a sufficient number to work continuously, as the chairman has said, and I believe very effectually; and I think the bill, when reported back from that committee, will be the best bill and cover the ground better than any bill on the subject that has ever been presented to this or any former Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator thinks the importance of that matter required the deliberation and the consideration given to it?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. So the delay that has taken place in the House in the preparation of this measure, which carries the military preparedness program, has been such as is usual in this body in dealing with questions of great import. I think, as a matter of fact, for a short time there was some disagreement between the Committee on Military Affairs of the House and the former Secretary of War, which may for a little while have embarrassed and delayed the consideration of that subject in that body, but there has been no delay there because of any indisposition on the part of Congress to meet the President's views with reference to the general question of preparedness. There may have been, and there has been as a matter of fact, some disagreement as to details, but upon the general purpose and the necessity of its speedy accomplishment there has been no disagreement.

As proof of the fact that the administration and the two committees of the House are in accord I am advised that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House has reported, and there is now upon the calendar of the House the military bill, and I understand it will be soon taken up for consideration. I am also advised that the Naval Committee have practically agreed upon their bill, and that bill will be reported to the House in a few days.

Neither the military or naval bill has been yet reported to the Senate. If either one of these two great preparedness measures were upon the calendar, I should be in favor of displacing every other legislative measure in their behalf. Generally, it has been the policy of the Senate to await action upon these measures until the House has acted and sent the bills over to us. When those bills come to this body, if the bills have not been reported out by the Senate committee dealing with those subjects before that time, then, so far as I am concerned, I will vote to displace any other measure that may be before the Senate unless there is reason to believe that that measure will be speedily and quickly disposed of and gotten out of the way. Of course I would not include in that the armor-plant bill, because that is a part of the general scheme of preparedness.

I think I speak the sentiment of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber when I say that we recognize as deeply as is possible the necessity of speedy action with reference to these questions, and that we are willing, whenever the committees of the two Houses have got these measures in a condition for consideration by this body, to consider them to the exclusion of other matters, even though those matters may be of the most serious importance under normal conditions.

Mr. President, I would not favor the motion to proceed to the consideration of the so-called Ferris bill above the preparedness measures. I would not, as deeply interested as I am in favor of the rural-credits bill and as important as I think that proposed legislation is—I would not put that above the two great preparedness measures. As deeply interested as I am in a shipping bill, to which my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has referred, I would not put that above these two measures, although that is essentially a part of the general preparedness plan, for that is a military as well as a commercial and economic measure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And making our war vessels more available also.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to do more than to say, first, that I did not subscribe to the statement that we are not ready to meet the situation in Mexico, and if there be any unreadiness in any direction it is an unreadiness that can be easily overcome and remedied, and to say, in addition, Mr. President, that the delay with reference to preparedness has been a necessary delay. It has been such a delay as is usually incident to the preparation of great measures of that kind in this body and in the other branch of Congress. The work has been done as rapidly as it could have been done in the committees. When they have reported and these measures come into the Senate I think I can say, in behalf of the majority of this body, that they will be as diligently prosecuted to a final vote as is possible in dealing with matters of such grave moment and import.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it was farthest from my thoughts to reflect upon the Military Committee or upon the leadership of the distinguished Senator [Mr. SIMMONS] who has just taken his seat. I simply called attention to the fact that the bill which we are now proposing to take up will take several weeks, and, of course, any time utilized on the bill, if the bill is not finished, would be time practically wasted. I do not believe that it is possible to dispose of the so-called Ferris bill within any such time as has been suggested by the Senator from Montana. I apprehend that in all probability the Senator from Montana in preparing this bill has likely been compelled to neglect the time which he otherwise would have put upon questions of military affairs; and that is likely true with reference to other Senators who have devoted their time to the measure now sought to be brought before the Senate, so that they have not had the time to spend on other important measures which they should have had and which, in my judgment, it is necessary for them to spend upon them in order to work out any reasonable program of preparedness. So long as this and other important measures occupy our time here the work of the committee will be delayed.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina need not be disturbed about our misleading Mexico. Nothing that we say or do here with reference to this matter will to any appreciable extent affect the Mexican people. They will be controlled entirely by other matters and other conditons which have already transpired and of which they already have knowledge. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that nothing has been said here to-day of equal import to the statement of the Chief Magistrate upon his western tour to the effect that he did not have sufficient means to protect the rights of American citizens on the border. Does the Senator fear that urging the consideration of these measures will in any way accentuate or enlarge the scope of the statements of the President upon his western trip? After the President has urged before the people the imminent danger of longer delay will it cause consternation to urge here the passage of measures to meet that danger?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon men, I wish him to understand that, so far as the urgent consideration of these measures is concerned, I am entirely in accord with him.

Mr. BORAH. The point to which the Senator from Idaho is addressing his attention now is that which the Senator from North Carolina was discussing when he deplored any statements here which might accentuate the unpreparedness in which we find ourselves, to take care of even such a situation as may be confronting us now on the border. I was only repeating, in less classic terms, the statement of the President upon his western trip. I should like to ask if the President's speeches on that western trip have been printed and if they are yet at the disposal of Congress, as they were ordered to be printed some two or three weeks ago? If they have been printed and if the Senator will refer to those speeches again he will find that if the President of the United States is to be credited with the sincerity which we should accord to the Chief Magistrate, nothing said here to-day in any way measures up to the situation which he presented to the country some three or four weeks ago. Has the general situation grown better or has it grown worse since that time? Has the Congress accomplished anything in the time which has elapsed between the time of his going forth and coming back? Has there anything in the way of material progress or final action been taken upon the part of Congress in that time? No, Mr. President. The moment we rise to discuss this important subject some seem to think that our discussion has for its sole purpose an attack upon the majority leaders or the majority side of the Chamber. No such purpose was mine. I share with them the responsibility of the situation in a humble way, and so does the minority side.

Mr. President, if as the Senator believes, we are prepared, if he believes that the Army which we have——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I fear the Senator did not fully understand what I said. I said I thought we had now a sufficient force to deal with that situation, so far as our present enterprise was concerned; but I said if we got into a regular war with Mexico, doubtless we would have to increase our Army.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we should get into war with Mexico, and move at the rate at which we have moved for the last three or four months in the way of preparedness in meeting the situation, what would be the condition by the time the army which we are going to create shall reach Mexico? That is precisely, Mr. President, what the peace lovers of England declared against Lord Roberts's appeal for preparations for years prior to the situation which confronted England in the last days of July, 1914. If the condition of affairs exists in any measurable extent as stated by the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States is derelict to the utmost degree that it has not proceeded weeks ago to meet this situation. What could Congress do in the way of preparing to meet a situation which might be imposed upon us in a fortnight? What could it do to meet a situation which might be imposed upon us even in six months, at the rate at which we are moving? I say to the Senator that you can not pass these bills here, known as war bills, and have them meet the situation, as it may have to be met, inside of two or three months' consideration of those measures. It will take weeks and possibly months to pass real effective preparedness bills. I repeat that if we would do our full duty to the situation, we would close Congress to these other affairs and give Senators and Representatives an opportunity to be in attendance upon these committees night and morning, day after day, until these bills are shaped and passed by the Congress of the United States.

The Senator says there has been some slight difference of opinion between the House committee and the Secretary of War. Was it only a slight difference of opinion? In my humble judgment, it was such a difference of opinion as involved the very question of whether we are to be prepared or not to be prepared. Was it upon a slight difference of opinion that the Secretary of War resigned and betook himself to New Jersey, leaving the subject upon which he had spent so much time entirely in other hands?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me. I do not think I used the word "slight" with reference to the Secretary of War. I did perhaps say that there were some slight differences between the committees and the President, but I do not think I used the word "slight" in speaking of the Secretary of War, because I do not think those differences were slight. If I used the word "slight," it was an inadvertence; but I do not think I did use it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Carolina is more familiar with the terms which he used than the Senator from Idaho, and I accept his statement, although I doubt if he will be found supported by the RECORD, because I was greatly impressed with the statement. I am sure the Senator did say that there were differences only as to details between the House and the Secretary of War.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was as to the President.

Mr. BORAH. The Secretary of War took a different view of it. The Secretary of War felt that it was such a fundamental difference that he could not remain, and he did a most extraordinary thing, and such a thing as no man would have done who did not feel that it was fundamental, being as large a man in mind and character as the ex-Secretary of War. That is, he quit his post at a most critical time in the history of this country. He would have never contemplated such action except forced to it by differences vital and controlling.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator evidently has my statement with reference to the President mixed up with my statement as to the Secretary of War. I said there was a difference between the committee and the Secretary of War, and therefore the Secretary of War went out, but there had been no substantial differences between the committees and the President, and then I explained that there had been differences as to details, but those had been composed now, I thought.

Mr. BORAH. I had understood, in reading the President's messages before be started on his western trip, that he had specifically indorsed Mr. Garrison's plan; and I think the Senator will find that the President had specifically indorsed Mr. Garrison's plan, and therefore, if there was a difference of opinion between Mr. Garrison and the committee, there must have been inevitably a difference of opinion between the committee and the President, and afterwards between Mr. Garrison and the President, and between Mr. Garrison and the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, the difference was this: I think possibly the President did at first indorse to a certain extent, though not altogether, the plan of Mr. Garrison. The difference was this: Mr. Garrison was opposed to yielding anything and the President was not. Mr. Garrison refused to yield a part, whereas the rest of the Cabinet and the President showed a disposition all along to meet the situation as they found it in Congress.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I understand that there are very wide differences of opinion between the military committees of the two Houses, and that the bills formulated are very different in their effect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I simply desire to state to the Senator that these committees have not gotten together and undertaken to formulate a bill that should be taken nolens volens by the Senate or by the House. It is so with every piece of legislation. The committees on no other subject get together and undertake to formulate a bill that shall be adopted by both bodies without change. There is a bill pending in the House and one in the Senate, and the essentials of the two are not very different; and when the bills get into conference, the conference committee can straighten out these little differences. The fundamentals are practically the same.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it is not at all a usual thing for the two committees to operate jointly. I suppose that has not been done. I think it will be found, when these bills are compared, that there is quite a little difference between the two. I do not know what the Senator from Oregon may regard as fundamentals.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this discussion all reveals this state of affairs: First, that we have no program at all on this subject; that it is all as yet in a nebulous condition; that there is no agreement between the two Houses which could be considered such an agreement as would exist with reference to the fundamental principles. It further appears that as yet these committees have simply begun and no more to take up this matter; that there is nothing ripened or completed at all in regard to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the House Military Affairs Committee has reported its bill. It is on the calendar and ready for consideration.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that; but I trust by the time we get through with this program of preparedness the bill which is now reported to the House will not be recognizable even by its closest friends. Everyone knows that this matter of preparedness is yet wholly unformed. How long have we now in which to take care of it? Suppose that we take out the time we will have to have in order to pass the appropriation bills. We will be formulating these preparedness bills in the midst of a political campaign, and instead of having a program of preparedness we will have a program of politics. That is just precisely the situation. It must be clear to everyone. The Senator from North Carolina says he hopes not, but he is too wise and too astute not to know that what I state is the fact.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho speak for his own side of the Chamber, or for both sides, when he says that it is a matter of politics?

Mr. BORAH. It would be farthest from my thought—in fact, I would not have the heart to charge—that that side of the Chamber ever plays politics. [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. That is the first admission of that kind that I have heard from that side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must ask Senators to address the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. But it is not a question of which side is playing politics. The fact is that we will be in the midst of a political campaign. Why, the other day, when we had under consideration the question of warning Americans off of merchant ships armed for defensive purposes, which was supposed to be a vital question, did we not wait until a primary could be held in one of the States? No politics! Can it be said in sincerity that there will be no politics in the program?

This is a Government founded upon public opinion. As Tom Reed once said, no man rises above his environment; and it does not make any difference what class of men you have in the Chamber or in the other House—and they are the cream of the earth—they will still be conscious of the fact that a political campaign is imminent. There may be Republicans who believe that it is better that a Republican President shall be elected next time than that we shall have a program of preparedness. I would not assert that our Democratic friends might be so moved, but there is danger that they might be, unconsciously or subconsciously, affected.

Mr. President, we had just as well be candid with ourselves. These matters will not be taken up, unless we take them up at once, until they are taken up in the midst of a political campaign, and I fear you will not be able to keep politics out of a measure considered under such circumstances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, when this motion was originally made I was disposed to vote for the motion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; but a statement has been made in the midst of this debate which causes me to change my position in the matter, and I desire to have the RECORD show why I feel that I can not vote to take up for consideration the bill that the Senator from Montana proposes.

I listened with much interest to the debate this afternoon on the question as to whether or not we are prepared for war. I do not intend to trench on that feature of the debate. It is evident, from the statements that have been made by the chairmen of the committees that have those matters in charge, that there are no war measures pressing before the Senate at this time except the bill to authorize the Government to buy an armor-plate factory, or to build one, which it is proposed to lay aside if this motion is adopted. But, Mr. President, it is evident that the time is not far distant when it will be necessary for the Senate to take up these war-preparedness bills and other matters of great importance to the American people.

There are some matters of great importance, but of less importance than those bills to protect the American people from invasion, which might be considered at this time; and it is for us to determine whether we will consider those measures now, and which is of the most vital importance for immediate consideration.

Mr. President, I have been a Member of the Congress of the United States for more than two decades, and in that time I have never seen the public business of the Nation so far behind and so much delayed as it is to-day. I have been silent because the responsibility did not rest upon me; but I feel that the time has come, unless we are going to drag this session of Congress into the time when a national election will be confronting the American people, that we must speed up those bills that it is necessary for Congress to pass before we reach a final adjournment.

We have been in session for something over three months. So far as the Senate is concerned, if my recollection serves me aright, we have passed three contested bills in three months. It is true that we have transacted some business by unanimous consent—more or less unimportant business. We have passed an urgent deficiency bill, we have passed a bill relating to the Philippine Islands, we have passed a general dam bill. So far as my recollection serves me, that is all the legislation that this branch of Congress has transacted in three months. In what would have been in the olden days one-half the time devoted to a session of Congress, and in what I may say in the extreme limit might be called in these days at least one-third of the time that we ought to be expected to keep the Congress in session, we have standing to our credit three bills.

Mr. President, realizing that Congress can not adjourn until we have passed the general appropriation bills—14 in number, I believe—realizing that there are only two of those bills that have come from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and that not an appropriation bill is as yet on the calendar of the Senate—has the Indian bill been reported to the committees?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I correct my statement. I am informed that the Indian appropriation bill has been reported to the Senate and is here awaiting action; but the other great supply bills are not here. It is evident that if we intend to increase the Army and the Navy of this country it will be necessary to pass revenue bills to supply the necessary revenue to take care of the expanded Army and the Navy. It is equally evident that if we become involved in difficulties in Mexico, additional revenue will be necessary to take care of the affairs of the Government; yet none of these bills have so far been considered by the Senate. It has been pointed out here this afternoon that it will be necessary, before this session of Congress adjourns, to pass bills increasing the Army, providing for a reserve military force and an increase of the Naval Establishment of the United States. None of these bills have yet been considered by the Congress of the United States.

So, Mr. President, I think it is clear—it is evident to anyone who will analyze the situation—that if public business is not pressing before the Senate at this hour, it is but a short time in advance when of necessity the general appropriation bills, the revenue bills, and the war measures must be given the right of way, to the exclusion of all other business that may come before the Senate. If that is the case, then, in this brief hour that we may have to transact other business for the public, it is for us to select what business we deem of the most importance.

I would have cheerfully yielded any views I might have had on this question to my good friend the distinguished Senator from Montana, if it had rested at that. I realize, however, that the same issues, the same great principles, are involved in the bill that he seeks to bring before the Senate that were involved in the general dam legislation that occupied the time of this body for over a month. Now, pending this motion, the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has informed the Senate that if this motion is not agreed to, he proposes, as soon as it is defeated, to bring before this body for its consideration the rural-credits bill which his committee has reported to the Senate.

Mr. President, I try not to be a partisan. I am not speaking to-day as a partisan; but I can not overlook the fact that more than three years ago the party to which I hold allegiance pledged to the rural population of the United States, if it was returned to power, that it would write on the statute books of the country legislation giving to the rural people of the United States the same banking facilities that have been given to the town people for generations past. In other words, we pledged ourselves that we would write a rural-credits bill on the statute books of America in their interest.

I am not criticizing the committee that has had the matter in charge for the time it has taken to report such a bill. I recognize fully the importance of full and due consideration of a measure of that importance. I recognize further that if we were going to pass a bill of that kind that would be beneficial to the great farming classes of this country it was entitled to careful and full consideration, and that consideration had been given to it for more than three years past. But now the hour has come; the committees have reached a conclusion; the bill is on the calendar; the legislation is knocking at our doors. The Senator in charge of the measure states that he is prepared to bring it before the Senate for consideration. The time has come when we are to determine whether we will establish in this country a system of rural banking whereby we may assemble the banking credits of the farming communities for the farmer's benefit, not for the benefit of the city classes and of the great business interests of this country.

I am not one to cry down the business interests. I have often said that I am proud of the record our great business interests have made; but all the legislation up to this time to give cheap money and good banking facilities in America has been given to the great business interests in this country or the commercial interests in the cities, and not one line of legislation is on the statute books to give cheap money and honest banking to the rural inhabitants of America.

If we adopt the motion made by the Senator from Montana, what does it mean? It means that his bill will be pending here, in all human probability, for two, three, or four weeks to come, and that when it is disposed of the general appropriation bills, which must become law in order that the Government may exist, will be here demanding attention; that the revenue bill that must be passed in order that we may have the supplies to carry on the Government will be here before us; that the war measures that it will be necessary for this Congress to adopt will be here demanding our attention; and what will be the result? In all human probability the rural-credits bill that is now pending before the Senate will go to the waste-basket, and will not be disposed of before this session of the Congress reaches its adjournment.

With the promise of the Senator from New Hampshire that if this measure is voted down he will bring before this body immediately for its consideration the rural-credits bill, which has been waiting for three years to be considered; with the pledge of my party, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, that it will be enacted into law, Mr. President, I do not feel that I could justify my action in voting to adopt the motion of the Senator from Montana when I know that its defeat will bring before this body immediately a bill that should be on its passage to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Alabama and with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] regarding the necessity for a businesslike program—a legislative program which we can take up consecutively and carry out before this Congress adjourns.

There is a method of securing efficiency, which I have suggested in a resolution which I presented some weeks ago and which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and which is as follows:

Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives to investigate the conditions relating to the national defense and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

Resolved, etc., That the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, through a joint subcommittee of 10 Senators and 10 Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, 5 by each, are hereby appointed to investigate—

(a) The general subject of the national defense.

(b) The efficiency of the present organization of the Army and Navy and the increase of such efficiency.

(c) The advisability of compulsory service.

(d) The relation of the State militia to the national defense.

(e) The advisability of creating a council of national defense and its composition.

(f) The increase of the military and naval schools for training officers, and utilization for this purpose of the schools of agriculture and mechanic arts created under the Morrill Act.

(g) National cooperation with the States in school training, involving the fundamental idea of the use of arms for the maintenance of civil order, both domestic and international, and not for conquest, and the method to be adopted for the inculcation of such idea.

(h) The construction, equipment, and personnel of auxiliary ships for the Navy to be used in war in aid of the fighting ships and in peace for establishing routes of commerce and mail to foreign countries.

(i) The necessary cost of the national defense covering a period of five years, and including in this the extent and size of such organization of the national defense as will be covered by an annual expenditure of $300,000,000, $350,000,000, $400,000,000, $450,000,000, and $500,000,000, respectively, for a period of five years, commencing July 1, 1916, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress and with power to summon witnesses, to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject, and report to Congress as expeditiously as may be; that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said subcommittee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such subcommittee.

Mr. President, there are four committees now in session upon military matters—the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs of the Senate and similar committees of the House—and I may add a fifth, the Subcommittee on Fortifications of the House. This great subject is now being considered by five committees, with separate hearings, the same witnesses going from committee to committee, repeating their testimony, the newspaper reporters unable to keep up with the procession and unable to report to the press the substance of the hearings; and so we are drifting into the greatest confusion, without information or knowledge, and we will be soon face to face with legislation relating to detached portions of the national defense without full comprehension of its organization or cost.

Mr. President, the national defense is a unit, and the Army and the Navy are simply branches of that unit. There ought to be some method by which a joint subcommittee could be appointed, consisting of three or five members from these several committees, which would condense all these separate hearings into one series of hearings, so that the attention of the country and of Congress would be focused upon them. This would result in one recommendation being made by that joint subcommittee to the respective general committees and to Congress. It might possibly be that there would be a minority report; but, at all events, by that process the attention of the country and of Congress would be focused upon either one measure or two measures—one representing the views of the majority of this joint subcommittee and the other the views of the minority.

Now, Mr. President, what are the questions which we are called upon to consider? First, the general subject of the national defense; second, the efficiency of the present organization of the Army and Navy and the increase of such efficiency; and, third, the advisability of compulsory or universal service.

Now, how are we going to consider these matters? Are we to have the reports of five committees on this subject, or are we going to take from these five committees a joint subcommittee which will treat this whole question as a unit and give us a report?

For my part, I do not believe that we will have an army capable of meeting a great emergency without compulsory service and without that preparedness which compulsory or universal service will give.

The question we have to address ourselves to is the efficiency of our present system. We have for the last five years been expending an average of about $250,000,000 annually, an amount equal to the amounts expended by the warlike nations of Europe prior to this war, and yet with an expenditure not much, if any, surpassing ours we find that Germany, Russia, Austria, and France have summoned to the field the enormous armies of trained and disciplined men whose operations we have witnessed during the past year and a half. Two hundred and fifty million dollars annually we have spent upon an inefficient Army and Navy. The same sum gives those countries armies of enormous capacity and efficiency. There must be something wrong, and it seems to me that instead of dividing this inquiry amongst five committees we should have one joint committee selected from those five committees, so that they can inquire into that condition.

Each one of these committees is considering a certain branch of the great question, and none of them are considering the whole. It seems to me that we are approaching the question in a most unsatisfactory and inefficient way.

Now, what other questions have we got? We have the consideration of the advisability of creating a council of national defense and its composition.

Is that subject to be neglected by each one of the five committees that are considering the military and naval affairs or are we to have a consideration by each, involving separate reports and differing reports upon this important question?

It seems to me that the question of the national defense as a unit—the Army a branch of that unit; the Navy a branch of that unit; each adjusted to the other in such a way as to make a complete national defense, the diminution of one possibly meaning the enlargement of the other—can only be considered adequately by a joint subcommittee which is authorized to take a broad and comprehensive view of the national defense as a unit.

The next question is the increase of the military and naval schools for training officers and utilization for this purpose of the schools of agriculture and mechanic arts created under the Morrill Act.

Mr. President, we have to increase, and have to increase largely both our naval and military officers. Shall we rely only upon the national schools for that purpose, and shall we enlarge those national schools for that purpose, or shall we carry out the purpose of the old Morrill Act, which was to advance the military defense of the country by establishing in every State a system of military training that would give the country trained officers in time of war?

The next thing is national cooperation with the States in school training, involving the fundamental idea of the use of arms for the maintenance of civil order, both domestic and international, and not for conquest, and the method to be adopted for the inculcation of such idea.

Mr. President, it seems to me that is a subject of the highest importance, and it ought to be considered by a joint committee selected from these committees such as I have indicated. The condition of the world is such that it seems essential that we should enlarge our preparation for the national defense, and yet we have found that wherever a country has entered upon a system of military training it has resulted finally in developing the spirit of conquest. It seems to me of the highest importance that we should consider how in our military training we can inculcate the idea in the youth of the country that the great armed forces that we are about to create are to be simply aids to maintain civil order, national and international, and are not to be used for aggression or conquest.

This fundamental idea can be planted in the mind of the youth of the country in such a way as to impress their lives forever, and, on the other hand, we can plant the idea of conquest and aggression in the youthful mind. We can, if we choose, adopt a system of education which whilst teaching our youth that force is essential in human government for the maintenance of civil order, whether domestic or international, will make every soldier not a militant bent on disorder and destruction and death and conquest but an aid in the maintenance of peace and order, both domestic and international.

Now, the next question we have to consider will be the construction, equipment, and personnel of auxiliary ships for the Navy to be used in war in aid of the fighting ships and in peace for establishing new routes of commerce and mail to foreign countries.

We have been considering this question for years, ever since the subsidy bill was up in the Senate under a Republican administration many years ago. The question as to whether we should subsidize a merchant marine or whether we should create in our Navy, as a part of it, auxiliary ships which in time of war could be used in aid of the fighting ships and in time of peace in opening up new routes of commerce.

The Democratic Party has been in power for three years and has been considering this question. At the very outbreak of the war we had an opportunity, upon our naval bill, of adding these naval auxiliaries, but we lost the opportunity, and now we are engaged in the House in the consideration of a shipping bill which, whilst serving this purpose, contains a provision, objectionable to many in the Senate and the House, for the operation by the Government of the ships themselves in commerce and in trade.

The important thing, it seems to me, is to get the ships, to acquire them as a part of the Navy, since we differ on this question of subsidy, to provide at present for leasing these ships to responsible companies under regulation of a shipping board in time of peace, and to stop there. We can all be united upon such a proposal, leaving the question of the governmental operation of the ships themselves for future determination, according to the wisdom of the hour.

Then comes the question of the necessary cost of the national defense, covering a period of five years, and including in this the extent and size of such organization of the national defense as will be covered by an annual expenditure of $300,000,000, $350,000,000, $400,000,000, $450,000,000, and $500,000,000, respectively, for a period of five years, commencing July 1, 1916.

Mr. President, the important thing that we want to determine is the cost of this national defense, and it seems to me that that is a matter we ought to determine before we create the organization.

The joint subcommittee, such as I have referred to, would call upon the General Staff and the War College and other authorities and indicate to Congress what kind of Military and Naval Establishment they would advise costing $300,000,000 annually, what kind of a Military and Naval Establishment they would advise to cost $350,000 annually, and so on. Then you would have presented to us a tabulated statement of the organization, both of the Army and the Navy, that would be covered by each one of these sums, respectively, and act intelligently on the subject and take whatever proposal suited its judgment.

As it is we are going on in an accidental way, each committee making its report, Congress acting upon the report of each committee, and moving along in such a way as to involve no knowledge upon our part of the entire cost of preparedness.

The American people want to know what their Military Establishment, including both Army and Navy, is going to cost, and we want to know what is the best kind of a Military Establishment that can be given us for the annual expenditure of $300,000,000, $350,000,000, and $400,000,000, respectively.

Mr. President, if we go at this thing in this businesslike way we could soon reach a conclusion. We would soon get out of all this doubt and confusion. We could require of the Army experts a diagram showing the number of regiments of Cavalry, the number of regiments of Infantry, the number of men employed in the ordnance, the number of men required in the Engineer Corps, and their cost, and then, having got at the cost of the standing army, we could proceed and consider the methods under which a large reserve can be gradually established without great cost to the country. We could proceed in the same way with the Navy. Thus having marked out a definite program costing these various sums it will be easy, or comparatively easy, for Congress to take its choice.

As it is, there is every probability that the House committee will report a military bill based upon one theory and the Senate committee will report a military bill based upon another theory and that the Members of the House will stick to the report of their committee and that the Members of the Senate will stick to the report of their committee, and you will then find these systems in conflict between the two Houses.

Mr. President, it is important whilst this investigation is going on that public opinion should be educated as well as Congress itself and public opinion is not being educated. Nothing can be more confused than to attempt to follow the hearings of these five committees.

Realizing that I knew little about the subject, for I have never been identified with any military committee, I sent the other day for the hearings in one committee and found a great stack of them from which it was almost impossible for me to extract the information that would be of service.

I was told that there were similar stacks accumulated in each one of these committees, almost without the knowledge of Congress and certainly without the knowledge of the country. Newspaper men told me that they were exhausted going around to these hearings and it was impossible to keep track of them, that they were practically giving no information to the country. But the country requires this information in some concentrated form and that form should be given in the single hearings before a single committee or subcommittee which will be properly representative of all the committees that have jurisdiction of this subject. That is a method which we have pursued repeatedly. We got into difficulty over our monetary legislation and it was impossible to find common ground until we organized a joint commission composed of the Members of the Senate and House. With reference to interstate commerce we found there were numerous proposals concerning which there was great difference of view, and we recently appointed not a commission but a subcommittee of five from the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the House and five from the similar committee of the Senate and they are to report at the next session. I have not the slightest doubt that in that way teamwork will be accomplish between the committees of the Senate and the House. Their work will be presented to their respective committees for inspection and finally to the Congress. I have not the slightest doubt that this will prove a satisfactory method of reaching a conclusion concerning matters regarding which there is great difference of opinion.

Mr. President, I appeared before the Military Committee the other day and pressed this resolution. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee is not here.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He is here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the chairman, who has viewed this matter with a great deal of hospitality, I know, as to whether in the pressure of the consideration of the Army bill they have been able as yet to bring up this matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee has not yet been able to take up the resolution of the Senator from Nevada because it has had under consideration the other bills which were more nearly at heart.

I will say to the Senator that if this proposition of his had come in at the opening of the session I would not have been disposed to oppose it. I think there is a good deal of propriety in the forming of a bill by some such system as that proposed by him—that is, a subcommittee from each of the other committees—that have to deal with this question. Then they would have a measureable agreement as to the terms a bill ought to contain. We hope to take that up later. Even if it were adopted at this session it would be too late to consider it in connection with the proposed legislation of preparedness.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me a moment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Along the line of these inquiries I will state that I have a good deal of sympathy with the purpose of the Senator's measure, but it should follow the work we are now doing rather than that should precede it. We must have an Army and a Navy. There is already in the departments a board of strategy that brings into coordination certain points of Army and Navy management, and to have a committee such as the Senator has suggested after we have the Army completed and the Navy provided for and thus bring on still closer coordination would, of course, be an excellent proposition, and one I should like to support.

But as to the formation of each company, troop, regiment, division, and so forth, it is a matter that the Army people have entirely in their own charge and they could get no help on that from the Navy, or the Navy from the Army as to similar details, but following what we are now doing in shaping up an Army, we may with profit do what the Senator from Nevada is proposing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest this to the Senator: It is true that a great deal of the work which I propose that this subcommittee should take into hand has already been accomplished. The committees have now completed their hearings and are prepared or nearly prepared to report their bills, I presume. It seems to me when the bills are reported it might be very wise to appoint a subcommittee from these five committees to consider all the bills and make a recommendation to Congress. Their attention then would be focused upon the five bills reported by these committees. They could call in the military and naval experts and quickly ascertain the efficiency and the cost of each system, and perhaps the efficiency and cost of a perfected coordinated system which would be worked out through the very suggestions contained in the various bills.

The answer to that may be that the organization of the Navy is essentially distinct from the organization of the Army. Very well in such a subject the committee when they are considering simply the Army bill I would expect the members from the Military Committee to be controlling with reference to that. So with reference to the naval bill I would expect the naval members of the subcommittee to be controlling with reference to that. But surely council between them is absolutely essential as to the relative proportions of these two branches which is the unit of national defense.

Certainly it must mean that at some point the increase in military expense would serve to diminish the naval expense, and vice versa.

It seems to me that it is of the highest importance that thought should be given to the coordination of the two services, and I can not imagine any intelligent consideration of the national defense which does not embrace the entire unit both military and naval service by the same organization. We must have coordination somewhere. If we have coordination between the Army and the Navy itself, then the coordinated proposal which they make and determine upon must, it seems to me, be submitted to a coordinated committee on Congress in order to secure the intelligent consideration of it.

Now, Mr. President, we have the facts that, under the existing system, we have followed a most expensive military system—just as expensive as any military system in the world in time of peace. If you look up statistics you will find the total annual expenditures of our Army and our Navy reach the proportion of the military expenditures of the great powers who are able in an instant to command the presence in the field of millions of men.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he has the facts as to that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Facts as to what?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Can the Senator state the amount of money that has been expended for the Army and Navy per annum for the last five years?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not that before me. I looked into one of the statistical books the other day containing the naval and military expenditures of the great powers of the world for the past five or ten years, and I was amazed to find how closely our expenditures approximate the expenditures of those great powers that were able to summon millions of men to the field.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think in some instances our expenditures have been larger.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I dare say we have expended more money than France has, yet all we can summon into the field is the beggarly Army of about 100,000 men, and France, I believe, has about 3,000,000 men in the field to-day. There must be something defective in our system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator said, which is true, that the American Army costs more per man than the army of any other country, I presume, in the civilized world. But the American soldiers will not stand to be treated like the soldiers of Germany or of Japan, or of any other country, where it costs, probably, about $250 per man per annum. It costs in this country about $1,000. The American soldier, like the American laborer, demands to be better fed, better clothed, and better taken care of. Place our Army on the basis of some other army and you would not have a corporal's guard in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think there is another defect than that of the pay which goes to the private soldier. I read an interesting article the other day by some one to the effect that the English and French soldiers were better treated than the American soldiers. It is in the loose and extravagant manner in which we expend our money, without any system or without a proper consideration and study as to the effect of the money, which makes the greater cost on our part.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator state just who are better treated than the American soldier, and in what way? Did the writer state it?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I could state it in detail, but this was an article which appeared in the New York Times a few days ago, written by an American who had studied the question. He complained that one of the defects in the army system in the United States is the unfortunate manner in which the American soldier is treated. He said that the superior officers in the foreign army never treat their soldiers as the soldier is treated by the superior officer in the United States. He said more consideration was given to him socially and more comradeship existed between the officer and the soldier. As he urged, there was more of a democratic feeling, less snobbery, and more chance for the common soldier to rise. I do not recall the details as to cost or manner of feeding and clothing.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have had some observation on the point the Senator has just been discussing. I do not think there are any people on earth more undemocratic in the treatment of the private soldier than the American Regular Army. As a matter of fact, I have always believed that that was the reason why the American youth decline to join the Regular Army——

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator that is precisely——

Mr. VARDAMAN. But that has nothing to do with the feeding and clothing and the discipline and the expense of maintaining the Army.

Mr. BORAH. No; but that matter was covered by this article. I only instanced the matter to which the Senator referred because it impressed itself on my mind very much. I do not undertake to go into details or to carry into my mind the details as to the treatment, but he did bring out very effectively the fact that the rank and file of the army in foreign countries is treated more democratically than in our Army.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am not familiar as to that, but repeating what I said a moment ago, I am rather proud of the fact that the American youth in time of peace declines to join the Regular Army. The treatment he receives there is more that of a servant than a patriotic American citizen fighting for the flag or defending the flag. He is a subordinate.

I remember during my limited experience in the volunteer service at Santiago that the volunteer soldier had an ineffable aversion to the Regular Army officer because of that manner of treatment or the treatment he received at his hands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the treatment to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] refers is more the treatment by the people generally of the individual soldier than it is the treatment by the officers. In every country where universal service exists service in the army is an honor and a distinction. Universal service is absolutely democratic. Every man, rich or poor, is compelled to render it as a patriotic duty. That very fact elevates the man of inferior station and creates a spirit of democracy in the man of superior station, if we may term him such, and the real democratic institution, the only democratic institution, they have in these monarchical and imperialistic countries is the army itself; where every man, rich or poor, is compelled to serve as a matter of patriotism, and where they stand upon an equality in the ranks in service to their country; whereas in this country the service is a voluntary service, and in times of peace the impression prevails that no man of character or of energy or of ability will willingly go into the Army, because he is thereby circumscribing his career and denying himself opportunity. The public at large, accepting that view, treat the soldiers in the Regular Army with a certain indifference that at times amounts to contemptuousness. That condition would not exist if we had universal or compulsory service, in which I believe.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nevada, in speaking about men refusing to go into the Army, has reference to the common soldier?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I am speaking of the common soldier.

I think that that subject ought to be seriously studied in connection with the creation of this Army. We can not afford to have a very large standing Army. If we should have, if it costs a thousand dollars a year per man, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] says—and he undoubtedly knows—a force of 200,000 men will cost $200,000,000 annually. Then we shall not have an Army that will be comparable in force or power or numbers to the European armies. They must have some system there that enables them to get a very much larger standing army and an enormous reserve at a very much less expense per man than we have in this country. I do not believe the difference is in the liberality with which we treat the individual man; I believe the difference is in the system itself. Hence the importance of focusing the attention of the country and of the Congress of the United States upon a single expert investigation by a subcommittee composed of Members selected from these five committees, acting in cooperation with distinguished experts of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word or two with reference to the remarks made a few moments ago by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], to whom I always listen with much interest. The Senator from Alabama, at the beginning of his remarks, I thought rather urged, by implication at least, that we should proceed to preparedness legislation. I agree as to the importance of that; but I want to call the Senator's attention, as I did the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] earlier in the debate, to the fact that there is no preparedness measure reported out of the committees and now on the calendar, except the armor-plant bill, which has been voluntarily laid aside by its sponsors. Therefore there is no preparedness measure for us to proceed to consider.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama that Congress is far behind with its work, but I believe I am about as little responsible and culpable for that as any other Senator in this body. Since the 7th of December I think I have probably consumed about one hour of time altogether on the floor of the Senate in speaking. I have been engaged in committee work and other necessary work assiduously for about 18 hours a day, trying to expedite business. If preparedness measures are not brought out, the question is what shall we now consider? What does the Senator from Alabama want to consider between now and 6 o'clock this afternoon? I judge he desires to consider the rural-credits bill from what he says.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought I made myself clear this afternoon in stating that it was evident that it would not be long before the preparedness measures, the appropriation bills, and the revenue measures would command the right of way in this body, and that in the meantime we had several more measures that were knocking at the door for consideration.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I was just going to mention that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have the bill which the Senator from Montana presents and the bill which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has stated he desires to get up—the rural-credits bill.

Mr. MYERS. I am aware of that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And it is evident that it will be necessary for us to either select the rural-credits bill now for immediate consideration or to take very long chances on having it considered at this session of Congress. As I felt that the bill was of so much importance, the party to which the Senator and I belong being now three years overdue in its pledges to consider the bill, and as this was pending and knocking at the door, with all of the importance of the bill which the Senator presents, which I recognize—I may not agree with him in all of the details of the bill, but I recognize it is a matter of great importance—with all the importance that that bill represents, here is a bill that goes to the very prosperity of the agricultural masses of this country, and which practically has the united support of his party and my party, that may be sidetracked for good and all at this session of Congress if we do not take it up now. That is the argument I made and the reason why I insisted on the importance of the immediate consideration of that bill.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I was just getting to that point. I realized that; but after the Senator had spoken about the importance of preparedness legislation, and admitted that there was none of that character now before the Senate, he then urged that we proceed to the consideration of the rural-credits bill instead of the bill which I have moved to take up.

Now, I want to say in regard to that, Mr. President, that I believe there is time to pass both bills, and I think we ought to pass both. I am in favor of the rural-credits bill; I am in favor of water-power legislation; I am in favor of both. I realize the importance of both and expect to support both; I believe that there is time enough to pass both; and I believe we ought to stay here until we enact all of the necessary legislation, and until such time as we shall have discharged our full duty, even if we stay here until November. I do not think we ought to be scared if somebody shouts politics at us. I think we ought to stay at our post of duty if it takes all summer and all fall to give the people the legislation which they need and which we have promised.

I believe that by all rules of fairness and justice and propriety as between these two measures we ought to take up the water-power legislation at this time. That bill was reported out of the Senate Committee on Public Lands in January. It was reported before the Philippines bill was disposed of. It was reported a month—I believe a full month—before the rural credits bill was reported. There is here on the floor neither the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which had charge of the rural-credits bill, nor the Senator who reported it to the Senate; neither one of them is urging its immediate consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator who has charge of the measure is on the floor—the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. MYERS. I say that neither one of them is urging that his measure be proceeded with, but they have virtually given way to my measure; and I do not see why we should not accept their judgment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that it was on the statement of the junior Senator from New Hampshire that his bill was on the calendar, and that he was prepared to take it up, and intended to move to take it up in the event that this motion was not adopted; that I felt that it was necessary for me to make the statement which I did, realizing, as I do, that we take the chances of sending the rural-credits bill to the shambles of legislation if we fail to act now, because the Senator from Montana has a bill that, when it is passed, may go to conference. The Senator has amended a House bill. The legislative track is clear for the Senator's bill. When we take that up, when we consider it, it goes to conference, but the rural-credits bill has not been considered by either branch of this Legislature; when it passes this House it must go to the House of Representatives and get the right of way on the calendar of that body. Now, if we take up this bill——

Mr. MYERS. I will ask, Has that bill not been reported to the House as well as to the Senate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it has not been considered by the House.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator from Montana will permit me, the bill has not been reported to the House by the House Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. MYERS. But is it not to be reported?

Mr. HOLLIS. I suppose so. They have been working on it, but they have not yet agreed upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Montana will allow me, I recognize the fact that sometimes it takes a vast deal of time to transact legislation in this Chamber, but sometimes the Senate can transact its legislation very rapidly. When you go to the other end of the Capitol, however, with 435 men constituting that body, important legislation is always slow.

Mr. MYERS. Pardon me, but they do more business in a day in the House than we do in six weeks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They do on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MYERS. They do business while we waste time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be true in some respects.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Alabama was there long enough to know the difference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know the difference, and I also know when we approach the end of the session of Congress, with many measures pressing for consideration there will be an absolute necessity of giving appropriation bills, revenue measures, and war-preparedness bills the right of way. I fear that if we should postpone sending the rural-credits bill to the other House for another six weeks the probabilities are that if we send it then it would not be considered before this session of Congress adjourns, and I do not think that we who believe that that is a measure of the first importance outside of the great supply bills and revenue bills, which are necessary to run the Government, should sidetrack it. I think it is our duty to the country and to those whom we represent that we should first pass that bill and then take up measures such as the Senator from Montana presents.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not wish to consume time; I desire to speak for only two or three minutes more. I prefer to close my remarks without interruption, and then I will have said all I care to say on the pending motion.

I believe that, according to every rule of fairness, justice, and propriety, the water-power measure should be brought up for consideration now. The Senate has been legislating on that subject; it is fresh in the minds of the Senate. If the water-power bill can follow now, it will come in naturally and logically and appropriately; and I believe the discussion will be far shorter than it would be if the subject should be allowed to get cold and a couple of months later it should be brought up as an entirely new matter.

More than that, the bill was reported out in January. It was reported a full month ahead of the report on the rural-credits bill. It was reported even before the Philippines bill was passed, before the Shields power bill was taken up for discussion; and, after conference and discussion with some of the Senators, with the Secretary of the Interior, and with others who are favorable to water-power legislation and interested in it, it was rather agreed and understood that the Shields bill was to come on first, break the way and open the discussion, and then there was a tacit understanding, on my part at least, that the Ferris water-power bill was to follow right in the wake of it, right on its heels, and be disposed of, and that we would thus get rid of the entire subject. I acted on that understanding.

Now, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that for three years we have been promising the people rural-credits legislation. There has been a demand for 10 years in this country for water-power legislation, but none has been enacted. The Senator from Alabama speaks of the importance of the rural-credits bill. I admit its importance, but the Ferris bill is a bill of great importance likewise. It is really a part of our preparedness measures. It will enable the people of this country, through the Government, to engage in the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, to provide for the manufacture of explosives, to provide munitions of war, it will enable us to supply the farmers of this country with fertilizers for their lands which are being exhausted; it will increase by a fabulous figure the agricultural production of this country; it will enable us to lay up agricultural products, food products, for our support in case of war; it will promote the prosperity of the farmer by increasing his products; it will lower the cost of living by giving the people increased agricultural products at a cheaper price; it will develop manufacturing and insure the investment of money in many lines of business; it will promote the general prosperity of this country, I believe, fully as much as rural-credits legislation, as much as I believe in that.

I always respect the judgment of the Senator from Alabama, even if I can not agree with him. In this instance I do not agree with him. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has reported the rural-credits bill, has virtually made way on the floor of the Senate for the water-power bill, giving it the right of way. The Senator who reported the rural-credits bill has virtually given the Ferris bill the first opportunity. If those two Senators are willing that water legislation shall have a chance for its life now, why should not other Senators be willing? Let us pursue the logical, reasonable, sequential, appropriate course by disposing of one subject at a time. Like the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I believe in having a legislative program. My program is to dispose of one subject at a time and then go on with something else. We have been on water-power legislation; let us finish it. I believe that, according to all rules of fairness and justice, my motion ought to prevail, and I hope that it will.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from Montana, I wish to express the views of the farmers of my State on this rural-credits bill which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] wishes to hurry into this arena.

I represent a State that is wholly agricultural; it has no other business whatever. Therefore, I certainly can not be said to be prejudiced against a rural-credits bill; but I am unalterably opposed to the particular bill reported. I have here a protest against that bill; a protest from those who have given it careful consideration; a protest coming from an organization representing about 100,000 farmers in the State of North Dakota, with their affiliated associations. That protest is most earnest against the pending rural-credits bill. They say, and they say properly, that it is top-heavy; that it is expensive; that it has no applicability whatever to the conditions in the Northwest, and I might say almost the entire northern portion of the United States; that it is not workable in any sense. And they declare, after thoughtful consideration of the subject, that the enactment into law of such a measure as that which has been proposed in the Senate would put off any good rural-credits legislation for the benefit of the farmer for more than 20 years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator to mean that the farmers of his State are opposed to rural-credits legislation?

Mr. McCUMBER. The farmers of my State, the farmers of Minnesota, the farmers of that section of the country who are similarly situated, say that this bill could not by any possibility, without a change of its whole character from the foundation up, be made applicable to the farming conditions of the Northwest; that no benefit could be derived from it; and they feel certain that they could not secure a bill that would result to their benefit with this bill in the way. They therefore hope and pray that this bill may be put aside at this session of Congress so that the Senate may have an opportunity to hear from the entire agricultural Northwest, after they have had time to digest it, as to whether or not they want a bill of this character.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will allow me, I desire to call his attention to the fact that, irrespective of what the farmers of his State may desire, I find that the farmers of my State and of a very large portion of the United States, if I may judge by the letters which I receive and the documents which come to me, are heartily in favor of a rural-credits bill. If the particular measure which has been reported to the Senate is not satisfactory to the Senator or is not satisfactory to his constituents, it seems to me, if he is in favor of rural-credits legislation at all, the only possible way to secure the legislation which he desires—he can not secure it from the committee, because they have already found a different verdict—is from the Senate itself, which has not yet expressed its opinion and which will accord to the Senator the opportunity of presenting and discussing such a measure as his people desire before passing upon it. There is no question that there has been a demand all over the country for this class of legislation, and the only opportunity we can have to consider it is to bring it before this body. When it comes down to a question of consideration, as to which of two bills we should take up, one having almost a universal demand behind it, and the other a bill concerning which we find Senators who represent the States to be affected by it largely against its enactment, it seems to me clear that we ought to take up the bill which proposes legislation for which there has been a universal demand all over the country, irrespective of what may be in the bill and whether or not it is satisfactory to our constituents, in order that we may have an opportunity to amend it and make it satisfactory.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, what value does the Senator place upon a mere opportunity to present an amendment which may not receive any consideration and which will be voted down? What consideration did the Senate give to the Gore resolution the other day, the very nature of which was changed to indicate exactly the opposite of the meaning it had when the motion was first made to lay it on the table? Whenever a bill comes before the Senate with the seal of the approval of a great party organization, supplemented by the support of the President of the United States, representing that organization, my 16 years of experience in the Senate of the United States have shown me the futility of attempting any material change in that proposed legislation; and I would not expect to be able, no matter how well I might present the opposition, to secure the adoption, by the party which is responsible for legislation, of a rural-credits measure different from the bill now on the calendar.

Let me call your attention to a fact of great interest to my people. For many years I have been attempting to secure, for the farmers of my State, national legislation which would give to them Federal inspection and grading of their grain in cases where they must sell it in a State other than the State of production, whereas now the grades are fixed and every rule pertaining to the grain, its purchase and sale, is established by the buyers of that grain. A measure of that character was finally, after a great deal of labor, brought before the Senate but was voted down, because the farmers did not have such powerful organizations throughout the country as have the great commercial organizations, the chambers of commerce and boards of exchange.

Finding that they could get no relief in that way, the legislature of my State then enacted a bill to build elevators in another State. That was found to be unconstitutional. I mention it merely to show their struggle to escape from certain onerous conditions. Being unable to do that, we had to get an amendment of our State constitution, so that we might be able to defend ourselves and secure a means for the outlet of the grain, without having it pass through these exchanges. The failure of the legislature to vote the necessary funds resulted in a nonpartisan organization in the State, which was formed by the farmers and which voices their determination to clear the slate in order that their just demands might be recognized.

The farmers have had the question of rural credits before them for a great many years. They have studied every one of the bills which has been presented to them. They have appointed their State committee to investigate it; they have sent men here who are capable of understanding the meaning of a bill and who understand the conditions of the country and wherein such bill will not be applicable, and when those people speak with unanimity and ask that no legislation be attempted at this session they speak with the knowledge that has been obtained by watching for many years the method of putting bills through the Senate of the United States. They know well enough that when any bill comes here backed by a party and backed by the President of that party there is little hope of securing any material change in the bill.

Therefore, looking to the future, I feel that because of the enormous expenses connected with the bill and because it attempts to foist upon the country a double system of banks, a system which will be twice as complex as the system now in vogue in the United States—the regional bank system—they have a right to be heard and to have recognition before the Senate of the United States when they ask that at least the matter may be deferred until the provisions of the bill can be digested by the farming communities of the whole country.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIS. The distinguished Senator says that the people, or rather the farmers, of North Dakota have been to Washington to express their sentiments upon the pending rural-credits bill. Will the Senator give the names of those men?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will give the name of a representative who was here just a short time ago. He did not arrive here until after this committee had reported, but he represented all these organizations. I attempted to secure for him a hearing in the other House, but they were too busy just then to grant it; and so he filed his objections to the bill as the representative of the farming organizations of the Northwest.

Mr. HOLLIS. Is that man Mr. Grant S. Youmans?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. And is he the only one the Senator has seen?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, I have had petitions and letters from thousands of men representing the different local societies.

Mr. HOLLIS. Has the Senator filed any of those petitions of protest with the Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; there have been a great many of them filed.

Mr. HOLLIS. Filed with the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; there have been some filed here as petitions and referred to the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think the Senator knew that I was chairman of the committee that was considering this subject, and I ask him if he has called any of them to my attention until this moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose that when a petition is filed and referred to a committee it receives attention without the Senator's calling it to the notice of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator if Mr. Youmans showed him his credentials to speak for the farmers of North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes, Mr. President; he did.

Mr. HOLLIS. And what does he represent?

Mr. McCUMBER. He represents the Equity Societies and also the Nonpartisan League of the State.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will permit me, I have here a Senate document, printed on the motion of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, which purports to be a speech delivered before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives. Upon having it brought to my attention this morning, I conferred with the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, and he sent me this written message:

> This is a barefaced fraud. This man has never delivered a speech before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. He has never appeared before the committee. He has never asked to appear, and would not have been permitted to appear, since the Banking and Currency Committee of the House is having no hearings.
> Mr. Youmans on Saturday, I believe, left with me a typewritten criticism, rather rude and largely ignorant, of House bill 6838, now being perfected, which seems to be to some extent a reproduction of an anonymous pamphlet recently issued. That is all there is to this alleged "speech" before the House Banking and Currency Committee.

I should like to add to that that the Senator's colleague [Mr. GRONNA] notified me some 10 days ago that Mr. Youmans was on his way here and that he would like a hearing. I agreed with the junior Senator from North Dakota that I would get a hearing for him. Mr. Youmans appeared. The junior Senator from North Dakota told me that he would be glad to give him a hearing. Mr. Youmans declined to have a hearing before our committee. He has expressed no objections of any kind to us, and he has gone home. Now, he has compiled from an anonymous pamphlet that has been distributed this winter, and the author of which evidently knew nothing about the bill, this so-called speech before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

I wish to state to the Senator that his colleague has been on this committee. His colleague has voted to report this bill favorably. While there may be some things in it that he would like to have changed, he is to have every opportunity to present them to the Senate. It is not a partisan bill. It has been expressly kept a nonpartisan bill. The farmers of North Dakota have had every chance to be heard for the past two years and a half, and the bill has had the most careful consideration.

I think so much is due at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the gentleman whose letter has just been read had given half as much consideration to the requests that were made for hearings and requests upon my part in sending over various parties, there probably would have been a hearing accorded Mr. Youmans in his committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me answer the Senator's question first and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

As a matter of fact, here is the case: This Mr. Youmans, who represents these societies, did not arrive here until after the bill had been reported from the Senate committee. Therefore, the bill having been reported, there was no necessity for asking that committee for any further hearing, because his objections probably would not have been even read. I found that it was inconvenient for the House committee to get together, and it was perfectly satisfactory to Mr. Youmans merely to present his article in the form of a written statement. As he prepared it, he expected to deliver it orally. Finding that that would be inconvenient, he simply filed the statement, and while it reads upon the face of it as he intended it should be in the first instance, a speech delivered, it would have been more proper, as it was, if it had said "speech presented," because it was simply presented to the committee in the House, and then, by my request, it was ordered to be printed.

The article itself will show whether or not the author of it understood the bill. I am positive that he did understand the bill, and understood it quite well. I know that some of the criticisms are exceedingly well founded. I am not criticizing anyone who supports this bill. I am simply saying that this bill will be a dead letter in the Northwestern States, and I can not believe that the committee felt very confident that its provisions would be very successful, because, doubtful of one kind of a system, they made provision for two kinds, so that if one would not work possibly the other might work, thus adding very much to the complexity of the scheme. But it is so expensive, it is so top-heavy, it requires so much on the part of the borrower, and it is such a complex system, that it could not be operated without making the expenses so heavy that the farmers would practically have to pay as much in interest as they pay now.

There is an attempt to get around that by providing that the Government shall take the stock, if private individuals will not take it, and providing that the Government shall deposit money without interest, and that the Government should pay part of the expenses. That would not have been necessary at all if the bill were so worded that it would invite capital to go into the project. But there is first a system of banks that correspond to a certain extent to the Federal reserve banks, and then there is still another system of joint-stock banks, and then there are farm organizations, and there are attorneys, and there are special agents, and a host of officers, examiners, and so forth, most of them receiving good salaries, and you can not organize with less than $250,000 or $500,000 capital, depending upon the population of the State; and before you get through with the red-tape proceedings, the average farmer would drop his application for a loan in such banks, and would go to the ordinary bank or farm-loan company.

If you want to impose that system upon the farming public, of course we shall have to submit to it; but I know that I speak the sentiment of the farmers of the Northwest and of their organizations when I say they do not want this bill and prefer that it should go over.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there would be very great force in what the Senator from North Dakota has said were it not for one statement which he has made, and that was this: He stated that he wanted this bill to go over because the farmers in his section had not yet had time to digest the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that the Senator would not intentionally misquote me.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly would not.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I wish to say most earnestly that I made no such statement. I stated that the farmers in my section of the country had digested the bill, but that the farmers generally over the United States had not. That is quite a different proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. Possibly I misunderstood the Senator. I certainly had no desire to misquote him.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that.

Mr. POMERENE. But that was as I understood him. In any event, the fact that he states that the farmers generally have not had an opportunity to digest this bill would indicate that probably some of the farmers who are objecting to the passage of the bill have not digested it; and if that be so, I can understand the ground for many of their objections.

I was not a member of the subcommittee that had this matter in charge; but as a member of the general Banking and Currency Committee I have given a good deal of attention to the consideration of this bill, and I do not believe the Senator himself will say, upon further deliberation on this bill, that it has not been pretty well considered. It may be that some of its provisions will not meet his approval, and I do not hesitate to say that there are some provisions in the bill that do not meet the approval of all the members of the committee; but the general plan which has been adopted does meet, I think, the approval of nearly every member of the committee. There was considerable difference as to certain features of the bill; but as to those we were almost unanimously of opinion that they were of such a character that we had better thrash them out on the floor of the Senate.

If some of the provisions of the bill do not meet the approval of the Senator from North Dakota or of his constituents, their views can be presented here to the Senate in open session in the course of the debate, and if they have something better to offer I am willing for one to accept it. I am not wedded to any particular plan; but I am, without any qualification whatsoever, of the opinion that we would make a very great mistake if we did not at this session of Congress adopt some rural-credit legislation for the benefit of the great farming industries of this country.

I have a good deal of sympathy with what the Senators from Montana have had to say with respect to the power bill, and I voted a moment ago against tabling the motion to make the power bill a special order. Upon further reflection, however, it does seem to me that there are 10 men who are interested in the rural-credits bill to 1 who is interested in the power bill. I believe the people of the State of Montana are just as much interested in the rural-credits bill as they are in any power bill, and I have had this difficulty confronting me.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just one minute. In the consideration of the power bill which has been before the Senate heretofore it has appeared that the Senators from the States who are most interested in the power bill have not come to an understanding among themselves as to the best form of a power bill to be passed by this Congress. It has occurred to me that if the bill which has already passed the Senate were to go to the House and were there considered and discussed they might be able to give to the Senate some light upon the subject which would not only benefit us in the final disposition of the bill which has already passed the Senate but would give us additional light upon the bill which is sought to be made a special order by the Senate at this particular time.

Under those circumstances it does seem to me that there is a better chance to pass the rural-credits bill within a comparatively short time than there is to pass the power bill; and I shall be glad if the Senate can see its way clear to take up the rural-credits bill and thereafter take up the power bill. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, since the Senator has referred to the attitude of the Senators from Montana with respect to this matter, I desire to say to him that I think I can fully subscribe to his view that there are more people in the State of Montana who are interested in the rural-credits bill than there are people in that State who are interested in the water-power legislation. It is perhaps not unknown that the State of Montana is very rapidly assuming a position of first importance as an agricultural State, and it may not be unknown that already our agricultural output far exceeds in value our mineral product.

The real situation, however, is that a while very great number of people in the State of Montana are vitally interested in the rural-credits bill, they are getting along tolerably well. They are relying upon the ordinary sources, to which the agricultural population of this country has been obliged to resort for a century, for funds with which to carry on their industry, which is going forward in my State by leaps and bounds. The trouble is that the water-power matter is held tight; that you can not do a thing about it; that for 10 years there has not been an opportunity to put a dollar into that business in the State of Montana except in the way of the development of lands which have passed into private ownership.

The thing is tied up. We can not move at all. The agricultural population will go on. While the passage of the rural-credits bill would undoubtedly be a measure of great relief to them, they will go forward with the agricultural industry. The other is absolutely tied up, and we need the legislation.

If the Senator from Ohio will pardon a word further, I feel very certain that, in view of the way this matter has been presented, the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that we take up the rural-credits bill first would not be received with any particular hospitality here were it not for the threat that has been made upon this floor that there is going to be a filibuster upon the water-power measure. Mr. President, I want to know if the Senate has fallen so low that a man can get up in this body and, by a mere threat that he is going to filibuster a bill to death, put it off? We have seen that done twice here in the past week, and I wonder if it is not about time for us to put a stop to it?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I yielded, as I thought, for a question. Certainly the Senator will not charge me with attempting to filibuster against that bill or any other bill, and I am in entire sympathy with what he says on the question of the importance of the power bill to the great Northwest. I shall be glad to help along that legislation. I am convinced, however, that more people are interested in the rural-credits bill and that it will be of more benefit to the country as a whole than will be the power bill.

It is for that reason that, in my judgment, the Senate would be better serving the interests of the public if we should take up the rural-credits bill and dispose of it first.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, this discussion has taken rather wide range. I should not detain the Senate a moment this afternoon but for the fact that, in so far as I can, I desire to correct a misstatement of fact, or, rather, the misinformation, that has been sent abroad, that this great Government of ours is absolutely impotent in dealing with a foreign nation.

It has been stated unequivocally upon this floor that the United States are not prepared to meet Mexico and deal creditably with the condition which confronts the country to-day. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the United States are stronger at this moment to defend the flag than they ever have been before in the history of the Government, and are better prepared in every way to do it.

When we went to war with Mexico in the forties we had a standing army of about 10,000 men. When the war occurred between the States we had a standing army of about 16,000 men. When we went to war with Spain we had a standing army of 25,000 men. To-day we have the best and the largest organized State militia, ready for action, the Nation has ever enjoyed. There are 50,000 Spanish-American War veterans of military age ready to-morrow to respond to the country's call—men of experience, sober judgment, and fired with patriotic zeal for their country's good. We have a standing army of over 100,000 men and officers. Thousands of young men trained to military service in the schools and colleges of the Nation are ready and eager to take up arms in defense of their country's flag, not as professional soldiers but as patriots, whose devotion to home, fireside, and country can always be relied upon in the hour of the Nation's peril.

Why, I remember that during the discussion of the prospective Spanish-American War, immediately before war was declared, the statement was published in the Spanish papers that the United States had only a little Army of 25,000 men, and that the Spaniards could easily land on our southern coast and march through to Washington. The poor deluded creatures were misled by such a statement. The real strength of this Republic in time of war has never consisted, and does not to-day, in its standing army, but it consists rather in the men of military age who are always ready and equipped to defend the country. Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Government, was opposed to a large standing army. He saw in a large standing army an eternal menace to free government. Jefferson was right. The menace is as great to-day as it was 100 years ago. We need a standing army for police regulation in time of peace and a well-organized State militia for the first moments of war. The battles of the past have been fought by the patriotic citizen volunteer, and the flag shall be defended in the future by the same character of patriot, if we shall remain true to the genius and traditions of our Government. Republican institutions have not in the past nor will they in the future live very long if they must be upheld and defended by a hired professional army.

Speaking of the readiness with which the American volunteer can be converted into a soldier, the immortal Prentiss once said, in discussing this very question:

"It is a sight worthy of the genius of our great Republic to behold, at the country's call, great armies leap forth in battle array, and, when their services are no longer needed, to return again to the communities whence they came. And thus the dark thundercloud at nature's summons marshals its black battalions and lowers upon the horizon. At length, its lightning spent, its dread artilleries silenced, disbanding its frowning ranks, it melts into blue ether, and the next morning you will find it in the dewdrop upon the flower or assisting with its kindly moisture in the growth of the young and tender plant. Great and glorious country is this, where every citizen can at once be converted into an efficient soldier and forthwith, after the war is over, return to his home a peaceful, self-sustaining, self-supporting private citizen."

Mr. President, when war comes and the service of the soldiers is needed it will be there in abundance and of the best quality. I personally have no fear of not enough military strength. The danger, in my judgment, is not in that direction, but the real danger to our best interest is too much militarism in time of peace, the ancient mortal foe to free government.

The professional soldier is an economic parasite that produces nothing, but consumes the products of the laboring man's toil. Every influence that emanates from him is subversive of free institutions and hurtful to free government. The average Regular Army officer, by reason of his environment, his training and aspiration, would rather serve a monarchy than a republic.

We do not need to wait until the preparedness bills are passed before every necessary arrangement can be made to meet the demands on the borders of Texas.

RURAL-CREDITS LEGISLATION DEMANDED.

I hope, Mr. President, that legislation of as much importance as the bill which is the subject of the motion now before the Senate and the bill for rural credits may not be laid aside to give precedence to the question of preparedness. The farmers of America have been pleading, they have been knocking at the door of Congress for the last 10 years for proper rural-credits legislation. They need it, the interest of all America demands it, and this Congress should respond. That sentiment had grown so strong that the Democrats at Baltimore had incorporated in their platform a promise to the American people that we should give to the farmers a good, helpful rural-credits law, and that promise ought to be redeemed. If it is necessary to remain here after the national conventions, let us do so and finish up the work. Service to the American people is paramount to party or personal consideration. It is vastly more important that we should pass the rural-credits bill, in my judgment, than it is that we should enlarge the Army or the Navy either at this time, and I shall never vote to displace the consideration of the rural-credits bill for any proposed Army or Navy legislation.

The American farmer demands consideration. He is the one citizen of this Republic who has not at this Capitol some special agent to promote his interests and to watch them and urge them upon Congress. He bears the burden of the Government, and actually gets less attention at the hands of the Government than any other class of American citizens.

I am going to be put in the very disagreeable attitude of having to vote, if the question comes up now, between the bill that my friend, the able Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], is urging and the rural-credits bill, because it has been stated that if the bill which he proposes is not taken up now the rural-credits bill will be taken up. To my mind, that is one of the most important pieces of legislation that Congress will be called upon to consider at this session; and I shall be compelled to vote to give it precedence in consideration before this body. Mr. President, rural-credits legislation will benefit especially the agriculturist of America, but generally all the lines of trade. Upon the prosperity of the farmer the success of all other industries in normal times depends. Let the soil be properly cultivated and propitious season bless the patient husbandman's effort, and an abundant yield will follow. Then shall we see the railroads running on full time, the factories crowded, the bankers' vaults will be filled with the depositors' money—the source of profits to the bank—the merchants will be busy, the mechanic, the artisan will find employment, the doctor and the lawyer will collect their fees, the preachers will wear new clothes, and plenty and prosperity will bless the land. But, on the other hand, if you cripple the farmer, paralyze his strong arm, let unfavorable seasons come, discourage and hinder his endeavor, and you will see the whole superstructure of commerce disintegrate, languish, and die as the luxuriant foliage of the tree withers and fades when the blighting poison is injected into its roots. For this Congress to fail to give the farmers of America this much-needed but long-delayed help will subject us, I fear, to censure which the good and faithful servant does not deserve.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I understand that legislation works slowly. I do not know how others feel, but I have that impression, and I shall take only a moment to state that in this bill touching rural credits the people of South Dakota are vitally interested, or some bill of this kind. It is their desire, as I understand it, to have a substantial rural-credits bill enacted at this session of Congress. I do not understand that a bill of this kind would in any way inflict upon other States the necessity of using it, or operating under it, if they did not desire. So far as the water-power bill of the Senator from Montana is concerned, I shall vote for this bill if I understand it; but I can not vote to have it considered at this time in lieu of the rural-credits measure. There is one thing I desire to say, and I hope I may be pardoned as a new Member in stating it, but I do think if the steering committee of the Senate would get together and map out a program of the order in which bills should be taken up, and particularly the administration measures, we would save a great deal of time in this body, and it would be the means of helping to expedite legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see why there is any real necessity for immediate action upon this water-power bill. We of the West have been told for the last 10 years that unless we would accept legislation that was agreeable to the former chief forester and the radical conservationists throughout the United States no legislation should be allowed to pass Congress. If the West were suffering for the want of power, it would be another thing. But there is an overproduction of power to-day. It is not power that the people are generally in need of. A market is actually needed for the power that is already developed.

In order to show Senators that the statement I have just made is correct I call their attention to the statement made by Mr. Merrill, found in the Senate document entitled "Electric Power Development in the United States," over which there was a great deal of discussion. We were pleaded with by the Senators of Montana to print the report, at a cost of something like $20,000. The report was to be on the desk of Senators when this very bill was to be considered.

I find on page 40, volume 1, of the report the following statement made by Mr. Merrill, who prepared the report:

> While the use of electric power for all purposes except manufactures is greater in the Western States than in any other section of the country, as will appear from a later consideration of electric power output, and this greater use explains in large degree the extent of primary power installation, there is also at the present time a considerable overdevelopment in nearly all the power centers of the Western States. In California, for example, where the installation in commercial central stations was over a million horsepower, the sum of the peak loads of the individual plants in 1914 was only slightly over 700,000 horsepower. The sum of the simultaneous peaks on the several power systems probably did not exceed 600,000 horsepower. If so, there was in commercial central stations in California in 1914 an installation of 400,000 horsepower in excess of all demands. A certain amount of surplus installation is always needed to insure against accident and to anticipate increases in market demand, but 67 per cent is far more than is necessary for this purpose. An allowance of one-third, which should be all that is necessary, would still leave 200,000 horsepower unused or but partially used while awaiting increase in markets. In Oregon and Washington the Portland Railway, Light & Power Co., the Puget Sound Traction, Light & Power Co., and the Washington Water Power Co. have installations largely in excess of current needs. A similar situation exists in Montana, in Colorado, and in Utah. In Utah, since the consolidation of operating plants into the Utah Securities Corporation, the margin of installation over the demands of the consolidated market has resulted in the closing or only partial operation of several of the power plants in the system. While there are doubtless many remote sections where small amounts of power could be used if it could be supplied at a reasonable expense, the Western States in general are overdeveloped at the present time, and the real demand is for more markets rather than for more power.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator believe that statement is accurate as to Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I heard the Senator from Montana the other day say that it was not accurate as to Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator, also, does he not know that Mr. Pierce, of Seattle, has been here ever since Congress commenced, and hopes for the passage of an act which will allow him to put in a dam in the Columbia River at Priest Rapids, in the State of Washington, that will develop anywhere from 250,000 to 400,000 horsepower?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; Mr. Pierce has been here the time stated by the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator also know——

Mr. SMOOT. Wait until I answer the Senator. I yielded to the Senator for a question, and I am entitled to answer it.

It is true that Mr. Pierce has been here the time stated by the Senator from Montana, but I have not heard Mr. Pierce once make the statement that there was a lack of electric power in the State of Washington or in the State of Oregon. Mr. Pierce, of course, would very much appreciate action upon the bill when it is amended, as it will be by certain amendments that the chairman of the committee will offer. The Columbia River is a navigable river and power developed upon that river will be under the Shields bill, already passed by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I simply desire to ask the Senator, in view of that statement, whether he thinks that Washington is overdeveloped?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Pierce has said that if the Shields bill were passed power enough could be developed at Priest Rapids to manufacture nitrates from the air, but as far as any organization of a company is concerned for that purpose, I have never heard him say there was such an organization.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Senator another question. Does he think that Utah is overdeveloped?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say there is more power developed than the companies can possibly sell to-day. That I do know. However, I think the statement as a whole is a fair statement of the condition of the electric power systems of the West.

Mr. President, if it is not a fair statement, and if it is untrue, why should we believe any other part of the report? There is no confidence to be placed in the report if that statement is untrue. The report is supposed to be the basis of the legislation that is asked for. So, Mr. President, it seems to me that as far as the passage of the bill is concerned at this time there is no real necessity for it.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah from what report he is reading?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading from the report prepared by Mr. Merrill, entitled "Electric-power development in the United States." This is volume 1 and this is the report which the Senator from Montana wanted to have printed so badly.

Mr. MYERS. I did want to have it printed badly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the report I am reading from.

Mr. MYERS. I like information from any source. I do not accept all the statements made in the report any more than I accept all the statements made on the floor of the Senate as being correct, but I am willing to take them for what they are worth. I ask the Senator if he does not believe that water-power development is very much analogous to the building of railroads and that you have to develop water power as you have to build railroads in virgin territory to create a market and a demand.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but Mr. Merrill states that wherever there is 33⅓ per cent overproduction it is not necessary to produce any more power because that reserve is ample. I believe that statement is absolutely true. In other words, if power was developed for twice the amount used all the expenses will be charged to the cost of the one-half of the power used, such as the taxes, overhead expenses, the extra cost for larger size machinery, the extra cost of the transmission lines. If only one-half of the power developed is sold the cost would be too great to be of any advantage to the people of the West.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will decide that there is no real necessity for the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to make a statement. This afternoon when I interrogated the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, with reference to taking up the rural-credits bill, I understood the chairman to say that while the committee was ready to proceed with that bill, owing to the fact that many of the questions involved in the water-power bill were discussed here recently when the bill known as the Shields water-power bill was before the Senate, it would be best and would be just and probably would save time if the Senate should take up the water-power bill. I was somewhat disappointed, and I felt, and so expressed myself, that if there were special reasons why the bill should be taken up in preference to the rural-credits bill, I would not feel like interposing any further objection.

I did not hear the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who reported the bill, to the effect that in case a motion to take up the water-power bill was voted down he would then move to take up the rural-credits bill.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I was under the impression that by reason of the fact that many of the questions which I was told would arise in the discussion of the water-power bill had already been very thoroughly discussed, probably the discussion would not be duplicated. I was impressed by statements to that effect. I believed also that by reason of the former discussion there would be no prolonged discussion of the water-power bill if it was taken up, and probably we would be able to pass it by the time fixed under the unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the armor-plate bill.

Since then it has come to my knowledge by conversation with Senators as well as by statements made upon the floor and by the temper of the opposition disclosed in the discussion here to-day that we may not reasonably expect the water-power bill, if put before the Senate, to be disposed of for quite a long time, and that so far from the discussion of this matter on the merits there will be more or less discussion with a view to consuming time.

Mr. President, in that situation, while I voted against tabling the motion of the Senator from Montana, I did so for the reasons and with the impressions I have just stated. If the Senator from New Hampshire now says that he is ready and desires to take up the rural-credits bill, it gives good ground for a change of position if when that bill is taken up we can go on with the discussion; and that it will not be simply laid before the Senate and one or two speeches made and then an inquiry as to whether Senators are ready to proceed; and when it is disclosed that no one is ready to speak and Senators ask for time to prepare themselves the bill will be laid temporarily aside for other measures. In such a case I do not see that any progress would be made by taking it up at this time.

I would be very glad to have the Senator from New Hampshire indicate to the Senate whether, if this motion is voted down and the Senate decides to take up the rural-credits bill, he thinks we are in a position to go on with the discussion of that bill or whether it will have to be laid aside after he and probably one or two other members of the committee have spoken.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, answering the Senator from North Carolina directly I do not know of anyone besides myself who is at this time prepared to make a speech; but I believe that there are many Senators who want to discuss the bill and who will be ready in a short time. If the Senate votes to take up the bill, I shall request Senators to prepare their speeches and be ready to begin to-morrow. I shall myself be ready to speak to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. What will be the attitude of the Senator, as manager of this bill, if, after he and probably one or two other members of the committee have spoken, no one is ready to proceed, will he insist on a vote or will he consent to lay the bill aside for the purpose of enabling Senators to get ready?

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall not agree to have the bill laid aside for the purpose of allowing Senators to get ready. The subject of the bill has been under discussion for two or three years. It was I believe, indicated to-day that there will be substantial opposition to the bill. I know there are friends of the bill who wish to address the Senate upon it. I shall not consent to laying the bill aside, but if Senators are not ready to make speeches I shall ask to have the bill read for the purpose of having the committee amendments considered and disposed of as fast as I can. That is my personal attitude.

Mr. SIMMONS. Feeling as I stated this morning about the rural-credits bill, of course, if it comes to a question as to which one of these bills shall be proceeded with, I shall, under the circumstances, vote for the rural-credits bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this side of the Chamber has no responsibility, so far as legislation is concerned, except to vote their convictions. Everybody seems to be in a hurry to take up the work of the session and no one is in a greater hurry than am I. We have spent all day discussing this question when we ought to vote to take up a bill or not, it seems to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. Does he not think we are getting a good deal of light on these bills during this time? Has not the debate really helped us?

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been entirely unprofitable, but it has consumed the day. I think I speak for most of the Members on this side of the Chamber when I say that we are ready to vote on something rather than to talk much longer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let us vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall never do anything unless we do vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. This morning I understood from the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that he did not at this time desire to take up his bill. I understood him to yield to the Senator from Montana to take up the other bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina asked me this morning if I could present any good reasons why water-power legislation should be taken up in preference to rural-credits legislation. I gave him my reasons, and he said they were good reasons and entirely satisfactory to him. Of course, it is his privilege to change his mind.

Mr. SIMMONS. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has stated what I think is true. If I thought there was the slightest chance for the Senator from Montana to get his bill passed by the time fixed for a vote on the armor-plant bill, I should still be disposed to support his motion.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad the Senator still thinks my reasons are good. We now have the novel spectacle of neither the chairman of the committee nor the Senator who made the report from that committee being on the floor and urging the Senate to take up a certain measure, and yet other Senators urging that that measure be taken up. It appears to me to be simply for the purpose of forestalling and preventing water-power legislation. Neither the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. OWEN] nor the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who made the report, has been in the least degree to-day urging that rural-credits legislation be taken up ahead of water-power legislation; but both of them virtually assented that they were willing for water-power legislation to be first taken up, and yet we have the spectacle of other Senators going against their implied will in the matter. It seems to me that it is contrary to fairness and to justice, and that the measure which I moved to take up is the one which is first entitled to consideration.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Beckham	Hardwick	Myers	Sterling
Borah	Hollis	Nelson	Stone
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Sutherland
Catron	James	Owen	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Page	Thomas
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Tillman
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Robinson	Underwood
Colt	Kern	Shafroth	Vardaman
Cummins	La Follette	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fall	McCumber	Simmons	Walsh
Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Ga.	Warren

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

While on my feet, I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained from the Senate on official business and that he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this motion, if present, I withhold my vote.

I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Beckham	Johnson Me.	Myers	Sherman
Chamberlain	Jones	Nelson	Sterling
Chilton	Kern	Newlands	Stone
Gore	Lee, Md.	Norris	Walsh
Hitchcock	Lippitt	Oliver	Weeks
Hollis	McCumber	Page	Williams
Hughes	McLean	Pittman
James	Martin, Va.	Poindexter

NAYS—28.

Ashurst	du Pont	Pomerene	Sutherland
Bankhead	Fall	Robinson	Swanson
Borah	Gronna	Shafroth	Thomas
Brandegee	Hardwick	Sheppard	Tillman
Clapp	Kenyon	Simmons	Underwood
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Smith, S. C.	Vardaman
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smoot	Wadsworth

NOT VOTING—38.

Brady	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.
Broussard	Gallinger	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Goff	Owen	Smith, Md.
Burleigh	Harding	Penrose	Smith, Mich
Catron	Husting	Phelan	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Ransdell	Townsend
Colt	La Follette	Reed	Warren
Culberson	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Works
Curtis	Lewis	Shields
Dillingham	Lodge	Shively

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of Cascade Lodge, No. 138, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, of Berlin, N. H., and of Miss Laura Snow, of Keene, N. H., and of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of the Public Library Committee of Ridgefield, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to fix a standard price for books, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 215, Barbers' Union, of New Haven, Conn., praying for an investigation of conditions regarding the marketing of dairy products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Washington, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Robert Eilenberger and sundry other citizens of Republic, Wash., praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Washington State Association of County Game Commissioners and Game Wardens, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for an increase in wild game and to create preserves in the national forests for such game, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5031) granting an increase of pension to Miranda Wheelock; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5032) granting an increase of pension to Emmett L. Warren (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5033) granting an increase of pension to Henry C. Salton (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5034) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Harrison (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5035) granting a pension to Delena Stewart (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5036) granting a pension to Elizabeth Mason Sells (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

STATUE OF HENRY MOWER RICE.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 16), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Henry Mower Rice, presented by the State of Minnesota, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on March 11, 1916, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 3144. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington; and

S. 3873. An act to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why not sit until 6 o'clock?

Mr. BANKHEAD. By adjourning we will have the usual morning hour to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Monday, March 13, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 14, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 13, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, Thy blessing attend, we beseech Thee, the deliberations of this House to-day and all of its days.

Encourage every high resolve and noble endeavor, check every petty desire and ignoble purpose, that the interests of the people whom it represents may be increased and conserved; that popular government may prove all that has been claimed for it and more. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 11, 1916, was read and approved.

SHORTAGE OF PAPER MATERIAL.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk, so that it will appear in the RECORD, a short extract from the Commerce Reports issued by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. It is self-explanatory and needs no comment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks to have read from the Clerk's desk an extract from a report of the Department of Commerce. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The attention of the Department of Commerce is called, by the president of a large paper manufacturing company, to the fact that there is a serious shortage of raw material for the manufacture of paper, including rags and old papers. He urges that the department should make it known that the collecting and saving of rags and old papers would greatly better existing conditions for American manufacturers.

Something like 15,000 tons of different kinds of paper and paper board are manufactured every day in the United States and a large proportion of this, after it has served its purpose, could be used over again in some class of paper. A large part of it, however, is either burned or otherwise wasted. This, of course, has to be replaced by new materials. In the early history of the paper industry publicity was given to the importance of saving rags. It is of scarcely less importance now. The Department of Commerce is glad to bring this matter to the attention of the public in the hope that practical results may flow from it. A little attention to the saving of rags and old papers will mean genuine relief to our paper industry and a diminishing drain upon our sources of supply for new materials. The Department of Commerce will be glad to put inquirers in touch with the manufacturers who are interested.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman request the printing of that whole pamphlet?

The SPEAKER. No; simply the part that has been read, which, because it has been read, will appear in the RECORD.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend in the RECORD remarks on deposits in the postal savings bank.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD on deposits in the postal savings bank. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman asking to extend his own remarks?

Mr. RAKER. A good part of it will be my own remarks. Part of it will be a bill, and part will be remarks by a gentleman who has given many years of study to the disposition of these funds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

KILLING OF AMERICANS AT COLUMBUS, N. MEX.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a communication from Gen. George B. Loud, of New York, in the New York World of yesterday, touching the assassination of our soldiers and citizens at Columbus, N. Mex., 3 miles from the border line, where no picket guard was out, where there was no vidette post, and where the machine guns had not even been tested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter published in the New York World yesterday, written by Gen. George B. Loud, about the condition of affairs down at Columbus, N. Mex. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

WHERE WERE THE PICKETS?

To the EDITOR OF THE WORLD:

As a volunteer soldier of the Civil War, after reading of the surprise and massacre by Mexicans in New Mexico, I may perhaps be pardoned for what impresses me as a reasonable inquiry or two.

Where was the picket guard around that United States camp "before day," when the attack was made and which should have been sufficiently far out to give ample warning to the camp? What was the matter with this machine gun which at least occasional practice should have tested?

I noted Gen. Wood's recent speech to the students at Princeton, in which he is quoted as saying that volunteers could not be depended on. How many times were regular troops used in the Civil War when volunteer soldiers were available, which latter almost exclusively crushed the rebellion? Would not a few volunteer regiments relieve the situation and other possible massacres of United States troops by Mexicans?

GEORGE B. LOUD,
Past Department Commander, Grand Army of the Republic, State of New York.

NEW YORK, March 10.

PORTO RICO.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one or two minutes, at the end of which time I will make another request for unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes, at the end of which time he will make another request for unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Insular Affairs has unanimously reported House bill 9533, with a recommendation for its passage. This is a bill to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

For many years all parties in this House have recognized the necessity for a reforming of what is commonly known as the organic law of Porto Rico, and the Committee on Insular Affairs, when it was under the control of the party now in the minority, reported a bill for that purpose. Since the party which is now in the majority has been in control of the committee, it has reported bills for that purpose, and we have now a bill upon the calendar which, following a request by the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES] has, by unanimous consent, been given a privileged place, not to interfere with appropriation bills, bills raising revenue, and so forth. I desire now—and I am speaking for the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, or with his acquiescence and approval—to ask unanimous consent that beginning to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock we may have night sessions. I will formulate that request in the proper language, after suggesting the idea, to see if there is objection. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Reserving the right to object, as I understand it, these evening sessions are only to be devoted to the consideration of the Porto Rican bill?

Mr. GARRETT. That is the thought that I have in mind.

Mr. TOWNER. That will be embodied in the gentleman's request?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I sincerely hope, and, on the part of the minority of the committee, request, that this unanimous consent may be granted. As the gentleman says, we have had this proposition under consideration for many years. We have reported a bill here unanimously from the committee, after the most careful consideration. It is due to the people of Porto Rico that this bill should no longer be pending. It is due, I think, to the people of the United States, with regard to their obligations to Porto Rico, that this bill be passed as quickly as possible; and, in view of the fact that it has been made up by the committee without any regard to partisan considerations, and will not very likely take very long for its passage, I sincerely hope that there will be no objection to this request made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How long are these sessions to continue?

Mr. GARRETT. From 8 o'clock until 11.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Make it from 8 o'clock until 10.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask the gentleman whether he has consulted with Hon. LUIS MUNOZ RIVERA, the Delegate from Porto Rico? Naturally he is very much interested in this legislation. He told me that on account of his difficulty in understanding English he did not frequently attend the sessions of the House.

Mr. GARRETT. I have not consulted with him this morning. I know that the Delegate from Porto Rico is extremely anxious that the bill be called up and considered.

Mr. BORLAND. I am myself extremely anxious that a new organic law be passed for Porto Rico. I shall be glad to aid its early consideration, but I wished to know whether the gentleman had consulted with the Delegate from Porto Rico?

Mr. GARRETT. Not this morning; but knowing his general feelings, and what I have understood to be his anxiety that the bill be considered, I am sure that what I am now undertaking to do will meet with his approval.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, it is now nearly the middle of March. We have passed up to date two of the regular appropriation bills, of which there are a dozen, and of those the most difficult and intricate are still to come. Apparently we have no program in the House as to what we shall take up. If the gentlemen in the majority desire to end the session of Congress before next fall, I think it is fair that they should have some kind of a program. When that comes it might be possible to work here 10 or 12 hours a day. It does not seem to me that we have reached the time when there is any necessity for it, because if we stay here until next fall there will be plenty of time to pass this bill. Members of the House are all pressed at this session with work and ought not to be unduly pressed unless there be some prospect of getting away after a while. Up to date there seems to be no prospect, and I do not think we should start in to hold night sessions on bills unless it comes from an effort on both sides to speed up the work of Congress. I am quite willing to join in such an effort if I have notice of what is going to come up.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will permit, the Chair will make a statement that may assist in clearing up the matter. Within 48 hours the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the majority leader, will submit to the gentleman from Illinois and others a tentative program.

Mr. MANN. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on "Warning at home and abroad."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of "Warning at home and abroad." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SNYDER, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Anna Fetterly (H. R. 18394, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the bill H. R. 8348, to amend an act establishing a juvenile court in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8348, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8348) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia," and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask whether or not when this bill was last up for consideration the first reading of the bill was dispensed with?

The CHAIRMAN. The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. How much time is there remaining of general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 23 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin 35 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I will yield my 23 minutes of time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] yielded his time to me, and I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts such time as he may desire in addition to that yielded to him by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill denominated "An act to amend the juvenile court law of the District of Columbia." In effect it is to establish a juvenile court in the District of Columbia in conformity with modern theory and modern practice.

The history of this bill is as follows: March 6, 1914, the then Attorney General appointed a committee of experts to consider the amendment, revision, and codification of the laws in force in the District of Columbia pertaining to children. February 13, 1915, the present Attorney General submitted to Congress a supplement to his annual report which contained the report of the aforesaid committee and a draft of a bill, and that bill is the bill now before the House of Representatives for action.

It was found by the aforesaid committee that the present laws in the District of Columbia in relation to juveniles were inadequate and worked injustice. The committee found that the law at present in the District of Columbia, which was passed by Congress in 1906, creating a juvenile court, as a matter of fact created what was merely a session of the criminal court of the District for the prosecution of juvenile offenders. The committee found that the present law worked out in every detail the criminal law against the child. Complaint against the child was made under the procedure of this so-called juvenile court as a criminal complaint. The trial was conducted as a criminal trial. The finding of the court was "guilty" or "not guilty," and punishment followed in accordance with criminal usage.

It was found there were 16,557 children brought before this so-called juvenile court from June 30, 1909, to June 30, 1913. The committee recommended that a juvenile court be established in the District of Columbia based upon the modern theory of the treatment of so-called juvenile delinquency. This modern theory is this, that children are to be considered wards of the State, subject to parental care by it, and not as criminals to be prosecuted by the State. The modern law recognizes that the juvenile problem is a mental problem, a sociological problem, and a humanitarian problem, and enunciates the principle that the child should be taught, not that he is to be prosecuted as a criminal, but that he is to be cared for as a child, with his best interests in view, so that his future may not be blighted, his character impeached, and his reputation in mature years stained by the weaknesses and mistakes of youth.

In the bill which is now before you that principle is carried out logically and into its most minute details. The child is not brought into court upon a criminal complaint; he is requested by a summons to appear. Hearings in the case are private, and the records of the court are not open to indiscriminate public inspection. The judge is given full and plenary power, such as belongs to a judge in chancery when dealing with a ward. The bill now before the House is a bill which treats the juvenile problem in a more advanced way than it is treated in any State in the Union, and the special committee appointed by the Attorney General and the Committee on the District of Columbia hope, in reporting this bill and having it become a law, that it will be a model for juvenile courts and the treatment of juvenile delinquents in the several States of the Union.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. This is entirely a new court, do I understand? It does not take the place of any other court?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, as I explained, there is at present a juvenile court in the District of Columbia, but it is merely in character a separate session of the criminal court. The bill before the House proposes that a juvenile court be established which, in effect, shall be a court of guardianship for children.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the House that the bill is a broad and humanitarian one, and the treatment of the juvenile delinquent under the bill and under its terms and operations is as nearly parental as it is possible for it to be, which is the soundest public policy. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is not the bill as it is presented very radically different in form from the bill previously before this House from this committee?

Mr. TINKHAM. Not yet. The motion has not yet been made for the substitution.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that the bill under date of March 11, 1916, is to be substituted for the bill that we formerly had under consideration?

Mr. TINKHAM. At some time subsequent to the time at which we are now talking, in due course, a bill offered on March 11 will be submitted as a substitute, but this bill of March 11 does not differ in principle in any substantial or material way from the bill as reported by the committee in February.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman advise me where the bill reported in February makes any distinction between a delinquent child and a dependent child?

Mr. TINKHAM. It makes no difference, it makes no distinction, as I understand it. Neither of these bills do, so far as the jurisdiction of the court is concerned.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think there should be a distinction in treatment between a child who is delinquent of its own motion and a child that is dependent?

Mr. TINKHAM. It seems to me that the judge would dispose of both kinds of cases upon their several merits. If you are establishing a guardianship court for children, in the procedure of which there is no suggestion of crime—and that is the intention and modern theory of juvenile law, so that there is no child who is a criminal under 17 years of age—then the dependent child or the child who may have committed a so-called misdemeanor or crime, his act being no longer known as a misdemeanor or crime, could properly go into the same court; but, of course, the cases would be disposed of upon an entirely different basis, the character and circumstances of the case determining the disposition of the court upon its particular merits.

Mr. GARD. I understand that. I will state to the gentleman that I am thoroughly in accord with the purposes of the bill. I have been personally very familiar with the workings of the juvenile court, and I am in thorough accord with the obvious intent of the bill. What I want to know is whether there is to be any distinction in the treatment in this bill or the substitute between a child who is a delinquent child—and I refer to a child which had been guilty of some act which in a mature person would be a crime—and a dependent child; the child, in other words, which has not a proper home or had proper home training or bringing up. Is there any distinction in either the bill or the substitute between the treatment to be accorded by the judge of those children?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is left entirely discretionary with the judge on the facts in each particular case, either the delinquency or the dependency, upon the theory that the children of all classes are in this particular court as the wards of the court, their cases to be disposed of in accordance with the particular facts in each case.

Mr. GARD. My recollection of the bill as it was first introduced is that there was no such distinction, and, further, that there was no provision made for the punishment, if one may use that term, of any person of mature years who has contributed to or toward the delinquency or who has led into crime any juvenile person.

Mr. TINKHAM. So far as the last statement is concerned, there is a very clear section in the bill which provides for action, complete and plenary, against any adult who contributes to the delinquency of a child.

Mr. GARD. That is in the so-called substitute on page 19.

Mr. TINKHAM. It is also in the original bill reported by the Committee in February.

Mr. GARD. I have not seen it in the original bill. Will the gentleman cite me to the page?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is page 19, section 31.

Mr. GARD. Of the substitute bill?

Mr. TINKHAM. No; I am referring to the bill H. R. 8348, the original bill. I will read that section.

Mr. LLOYD. It is not changed at all.

Mr. TINKHAM. The section reads as follows:

SEC. 31. That whenever in the course of any proceeding instituted under this act, it shall appear to the court that a parent, guardian, or person having the custody, control, or supervision of any child coming within the provisions of this act, or any person not standing in the relation of parent or guardian or custodian to such child, has knowingly or willfully encouraged, aided, caused, abetted, or connived at, or has knowingly or willfully done any act or acts to produce, promote, or contribute to the conditions that bring said child within the provisions of this act, the court shall have plenary jurisdiction in such matters, and shall cause such parent, guardian, or other person, as the case may be, to be brought before it upon either a summons or a warrant for such order in the premises as the court may see fit to make.

The section in the substitute bill, I believe, is exactly the same, word for word, as in the original bill.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one desires to speak, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] on Saturday introduced the bill H. R. 13048, containing some committee changes from the bill now pending before the House.

Mr. TINKHAM. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the gentleman intends to move to substitute after the reading of the first section of the present bill before the House the text of the bill H. R. 13048, which is a parliamentary motion. Would it not be advisable, by unanimous consent, to have this substitute considered as the original bill, so that it will be subject to the same right of amendment as the original bill.

Mr. TINKHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the sections of the bill H. R. 13048 be considered in place of the sections of H. R. 8348.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that after the reading of the first section?

Mr. MANN. It can be done by unanimous consent. I think the gentleman's request is that the text of the bill H. R. 13048 be considered as an amendment to the text of the bill pending, and that the amendments shall be considered as though it were an original bill with the same right of amendment to it.

Mr. TINKHAM. That is it exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the text of H. R. 13048 be considered in place of the text of H. R. 8348, and that the bill H. R. 13048 be considered——

Mr. MANN. Not the bill, but the text.

The CHAIRMAN. That the text of the bill be considered——

Mr. MANN. That the amendments be considered as though they were the original bill, with the same right of amendment to them.

The CHAIRMAN. That the amendments be considered as though they were an original bill, with the same right of amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. And that the reading of the text of the bill before the House be dispensed with and in lieu thereof read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. And, further, that the reading of the text of the bill H. R. 8348 be dispensed with and the text of the bill H. R. 13048 be read in lieu thereof. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

If no one desires to be heard, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We are proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia," approved March 19, 1906, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That there is hereby created and established in and for the District of Columbia a court to be known as the juvenile court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 2. That said court shall be a court of record and the judge thereof shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of six years, or until his successor is appointed and confirmed. No person shall be appointed to the office of judge of the said court who is not a duly licensed and practicing attorney at law. Said judge shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take the oath prescribed for judges of courts of the United States.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question, if he is in charge of the bill, and I understand he is. Do I understand that this provision for the appointment of the judge of this court has no reference to whether or not the judge appointed is a resident of the District of Columbia?

Mr. TINKHAM. The bill has no such provision. On this point it is the same as the present law. There is no provision made as to where the judge shall reside.

Mr. DYER. He may appoint him from any State or Territory in the United States?

Mr. TINKHAM. So far as the bill is concerned, yes; but that is the same as the present law passed in 1906; with no change on that point.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman think there should be an amendment here to provide that the man appointed shall be a resident of the District of Columbia within a certain period?

Mr. TINKHAM. I had not considered that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the judge so appointed must be a resident of the District of Columbia for a period of not less than two years prior to his appointment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, at the end of line 7, insert:
"Provided, That the judge so appointed shall be a resident of the District of Columbia for a period of not less than two years prior to his appointment."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, recently this House passed a couple of bills which carried the same idea that the gentleman now proposes as an amendment to this bill. The Senate has rejected them both, if I am correctly advised, when there is far more reason that that rule should be applied to the other bills than to this. I see no good reason why it should apply to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he had yielded the floor.

Mr. DYER. No; I had not; but I will yield to the gentleman for a statement at any time when I have the floor, and do so with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, I see no good reason for this change. The present judge of this juvenile court lives just across the line in Maryland. He is clearly identified with all the interests of the District of Columbia, and I see no reason why the judge of this court should reside within the limits of the District of Columbia, and I trust the amendment will not pass.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, one question which is frequently brought to the attention of Members of Congress, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, is that the people of the District have no voice in legislation pertaining to their own business. It seems to me that in a city of the size of Washington we ought to be able to find enough men qualified and competent to fill the judicial offices, as well as other administrative and executive offices of this city; and I think it is a bad practice to use the District of Columbia in filling the offices thereof with political appointments, whether they be of one party or the other. I think the people who live here, make this their home, are best fitted and qualified to administer its laws. We have a question now pending in the Senate to bring to the people of the District of Columbia prohibition, without their having a word to say, without their being even permitted to vote upon it, as the States all have the right to vote when they have the question of prohibition up in the States. We talk about State rights and the rights of the people of the several States to govern their personal affairs, to make their laws in reference to prohibition, woman's suffrage, and things of that kind, yet here in the city of Washington we want absolutely, so far as the reports are in some portions of this Capital, to deny the people of Washington the privilege to say whether or not they are in favor of national prohibition; to deny them the privilege of having their own people appointed to administer the laws pertaining to so important an office as that of the juvenile judge, one who knows the circumstances of the children of the community whose interests he is charged with looking after; and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come when a judicial office, especially that of a juvenile judge, should be selected from the people of the city of Washington.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the honorable Representative from Missouri [Mr. DYER], who has just spoken, I desire to say that I thoroughly agree with him in the principle of appointing local men to local offices. I want to say to him that in the District of Columbia I believe it is a sound practice. I want also to say to him that I made a motion on two bills which have been before this Congress, and passed by this House, one in relation to the office of the recorder of deeds and the other in relation to the office of the recorder of wills for the District of Columbia, to have both of these officials residents of the District of Columbia. These amendments on those two bills were accepted. Both of the bills, however, were defeated in a coordinate branch simply because these amendments were a part of the bills. I therefore may say to him, and probably with some grace and sincerity, that I oppose his amendment not because it is not sound but because we want no defeat of a measure of this magnitude now before us, a measure of its beneficial character, on account of a minor amendment requiring a particular residence of a judge of the court. I oppose the amendment solely and wholly upon the ground that I am afraid that in a coordinate branch of this legislature some harm may come to this beneficent bill because of its adoption.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that the other body would object to this amendment to this bill? Has the gentleman information upon that?

Mr. TINKHAM. I was most credibly informed that the reason for the defeat of these other two bills——

Mr. DYER. Those were not with reference to judges. Those were with reference to other officials, were they not?

Mr. TINKHAM. They were. And in reply direct to the question of the honorable Representative from Missouri [Mr. DYER] I would say that the future can best be judged by the past. The past shows that the coordinate branch is opposed to the principle which is suggested in the amendment of the honorable Representative.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, by striking out the word "two" and inserting the word "five," making the term of residence five years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "two" and inserting the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. What is the vote being taken on?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the original amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That except as herein otherwise provided, the juvenile court of the District of Columbia shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all cases coming within the terms and provisions of this act. This act shall be construed liberally and as remedial in character; and the powers hereby conferred are intended to be general to effect the beneficial purposes herein set forth. It is the intention of this act that in all proceedings coming under its provisions the court shall proceed upon the theory that the child is the ward of the State and is subject to the discipline and entitled to the protection which the court should give such child under the conditions disclosed in the case; and such discipline and protection may, in the discretion of the court, continue until the child shall attain the age of 21 years, during which period the court may from time to time make such orders as the welfare of the child may require.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice they change the language so that it reads that "upon the theory that the child is the ward of the State." Of course, we ordinarily use the word "state" because it comes under a State. It may be proper to use it in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TINKHAM. In reply, Mr. Chairman, I will say that the word "State" is used as a generic term.

Mr. MANN. It is printed with a capital "S," however. It is not a generic term. And whose ward would it be, the ward of the District of Columbia or the United States Government?

Mr. TINKHAM. The United States Government, I should say. But I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out, in line 1, page 4, the word "State" and substitute in place thereof the words "District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 1, strike out the word "State" and insert the words "District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill with reference to the provision in this section which permits the continuation of any order relative to the discipline of the child until it reaches the age of 21 years, whereas in section 4 it is provided that the act applies to any child less than 18 years of age, and as to whether or not this might not be the cause of confusion or conflict of authority?

Mr. TINKHAM. In answer to the honorable Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I would say that the provision limiting application——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend. There is nothing before the committee. What does the gentleman desire to do?

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the honorable Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I desire to state that I shall oppose the striking out of these words for this reason: That I think it is a misconception on his part that anything in either section 4 or section 5 would lead to confusion, for this reason: That section 4 limits the age of the child to 17 years, if the child has committed an offense. This means that all children 17 years of age or less shall come under the jurisdiction of the court; their guardianship, however, may continue until they are 21 years old. There is no confusion about these provisions, because the first provision limits the age of the child in relation to the jurisdiction of the court; the other is the age which terminates the so-called guardianship of the court when it has taken jurisdiction—which are very distinct matters. I will say also to the honorable Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that the theory of the guardianship court is as follows: It is based upon the old chancery rule that all children of the Kingdom, or in the State, are wards of the King or the State until they are 21 years old. And that is true without local enactment to-day, that all children in the United States in the several States are under chancery jurisdiction until they are 21 years old. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted, as there is no confusion between the limitation of the word "seventeen," in section 4, and that of "twenty-one," in section 5.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose a young man at the age of 20, or 19, or of any age under 21, was simply guilty of homicide, or any other felony, is he protected from indictment and conviction under the law that covers all citizens above the age of 21?

Mr. TINKHAM. In reply to the honorable Representative from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I will say that there appears in a certain subsequent section of this bill that it is discretionary with the judge of the court to send cases as he may think best to the district attorney and the grand jury; that is, where the facts warrant and in his discretion. In other words, there is a provision that where a crime is committed of such a character that the juvenile court should not take jurisdiction, the judge may certify the case to the criminal prosecuting attorney and to the grand jury.

Mr. CANNON. That would apply, then, to those under the age of 17 as well as those above?

Mr. TINKHAM. That would apply to those below the age of 17. I would state to the honorable Representative from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that no one comes under the jurisdiction of the juvenile court unless he is 17 years old or under.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, assume this case: That a young man of 16 years of age had committed some offense and was under discipline by the juvenile court; that he had been placed, so to speak, on probation; and that when he was 19 years of age he committed some other offense which was within the jurisdiction of the juvenile court. Would it be possible, because of the fact that he was on probation, for him to be again brought before the juvenile court for this subsequent offense; or would he have to be taken before the district court for the District of Columbia?

Mr. TINKHAM. Under the bill, if the child or juvenile is more than 17 years old, the court has no jurisdiction of any act of his, criminal or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution creating a joint commission of Congress, to be known as the joint commission of Congress to investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8493) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. MCCUMBER as the said conferees on the part of the Senate.

JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the judge of the juvenile court shall appoint a chief probation officer, and such other probation officers as are now or may be hereafter authorized by law, to serve under the direction of the court in all cases arising under this act. All appointments of probation officers shall be made on the basis of merit only, determined by a public competitive examination held by three members of the Board of Children's Guardians, hereinafter provided for. The examiners shall conduct the examinations of all applicants according to such rules and regulations as they may provide and shall certify to the court for appointment to each position the names of the three highest, from which the appointment shall be made by the court, unless there are less than three applicants.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARD. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if there is anything contained in the bill placing a limitation as to the salary or compensation of the judge and clerk and probation officers?

Mr. TINKHAM. The salaries are left by the terms of the bill as at present, because the bill provides in relation to clerks and probation officers as follows: "as provided by law."

Mr. GARD. The gentleman means that the substitute that he offers carries the provisions for the payment of judge and clerk and probation officers as they are now?

Mr. TINKHAM. As they are now in, in these words:

That the judge of the juvenile court shall appoint a clerk and a probation officer and such other probation officers as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law.

Mr. GARD. Yes. But my question is as to the compensation to be paid to the clerks and probation officers and the judge of this court. Where is that?

Mr. MANN. The salary is fixed by the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. GARD. I was asking whether this bill carried any limitation or description of salaries, or whether they would be fixed, as the gentleman from Illinois indicates, in the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. Most of the salaries are fixed in the appropriation bill. It is not absolutely necessary sometimes to fix the salaries in the legislative bill.

Mr. GARD. I do not understand that there would be any objection to fixing it in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not legislation? Is it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill does not propose to change compensation or the salary of anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. By the last clause of the bill this provision is made, that this bill repeals only such laws as are inconsistent with this. Under that section of the bill it would leave the salary and compensation unchanged.

Mr. GARD. May I ask, then, is it the idea of those who have this bill in charge that the salaries shall remain as they are at present, or are they to be included and passed upon in an appropriation bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. They are to be left just as they are. They can not be changed except by authorization. If an appropriation bill should change them, a point of order could me made and sustained.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The bill which was originally introduced, I think, made no provision for the salary of the judge or the other court officers. The present police court act authorizes a salary for the judge at $3,000. The appropriation bill passed in the last Congress appropriated a salary for him of $3,600, and an appropriation is made for the other officers of the court. This bill does not authorize any salaries, as I understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is all right.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that inasmuch as it carries a provision for such other probation officers as are or may hereafter be authorized by law this bill, legislative in character, as it is, should indicate the amount of salaries to be paid to the clerks and probation officers and the judge?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not, for the reason that this bill does not undertake to change the present law.

Mr. GARD. Suppose, as the bill contemplates, there should be an increase of clerks and probation officers, as there might rightfully be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There can not be unless the bill authorizes an increase.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit, that would be true with respect to all the departments of the Government. This bill would authorize additional increases of force under the language you provide there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I think not.

Mr. SISSON. And the salaries of the officers will largely depend upon the amount and character of the work they would be called upon to do, and that, of course, will be problematical, as this is only the beginning of the court's operation.

Mr. GARD. I appreciate the observation of the gentleman from the Committee on Appropriations, but the chairman of the District Committee states that that statement is not correct.

Mr. SISSON. I have just heard the language read. I have not looked at the language itself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is not intended that this bill should change any salary at all, or that it should give any additional increase to the force at all, but to limit the force and the pay to the court and its help as is now authorized by law or as may be hereafter authorized by law.

Mr. GARD. Then the idea of the gentleman is that if there is any further authorization of increase in the clerical or probation office force, that must be cared for by additional appropriations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MAPES. For the information of the committee, I will give the salaries that are now paid to the judge and other officers of this court, as carried in the appropriation act of the last Congress. The salaries are as follows: Judge, $3,600; clerk, $2,000; deputy clerk, who is authorized to act as clerk in the absence of that officer, $1,350; stenographer and typewriter for judge's work and to aid in keeping the records in the clerk's office, $900; probation officers—chief $1,800, 2 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,000 each; clerk for probation office, $900; bailiff, $900; janitor, $600; charwoman, $240; in all, $18,690. The salary of the judge is fixed by law at $3,000, and I do not find that any of these other salaries are authorized by law.

Mr. GARD. I want to ask the gentleman who is in charge of the bill a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. If they are not authorized by law, by whom were these other salaries fixed and determined?

Mr. MAPES. By the appropriation bill, and, as I understand it, they would be subject to a point of order if anyone cared to make it.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit, on page 4, section 7, it is provided—

That the judge of the juvenile court shall appoint a chief probation officer, and such other probation officers as are now or may be hereafter authorized by law, to serve under the direction of the court in all cases arising under this act.

That, then, would not be subject to a point of order in an appropriation bill.

All appointments of probation officers shall be made on the basis of merit only, determined by a public competitive examination.

In the event that the juvenile court should want additional probation officers the only necessity would be to apply to this committee for an amendment to this clause of the bill, or a simple resolution increasing the number of probation officers, to serve in the discretion of the court in all cases arising.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman is a member of the Appropriations Committee, and I will ask him if it is not true that any salary proposed by the Appropriations Committee would be subject to a point of order unless fixed by law?

Mr. SISSON. It would not, in any amount, provided the officer was authorized to be appointed by this judge. Then the Appropriations Committee, without it being subject to a point of order, could report and fix in the bill any salary that it might see fit and proper, subject, of course, to review by the House. But no point of order would lie against it. That is done every day.

Mr. MAPES. I did not so understand it.

Mr. SISSON. There is a law which provides that where a salary has not been fixed, and the Committee on Appropriations shall fix the salary, the salary for the next year, unless changed by Congress, shall be the salary of the preceding year. Then any increase over and above the salary so fixed by Congress would be subject to a point of order. That is the rule.

Mr. MAPES. Then, if I understand the gentleman correctly, the office itself having been provided for by the law——

Mr. SISSON. The office having been created——

Mr. MAPES. These salaries as carried in the last appropriation act would be the salaries that the Appropriations Committee would be authorized to provide?

Mr. SISSON. That is correct, provided they are the identical officers and perform the same duties that they performed last year. If any additional duties devolve upon them and they assume a different relation to the court than that which they now hold, they would be considered new offices, and the Appropriations Committee, in the absence of a limitation by law would, subject to the review of the House, fix the salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the judge of the juvenile court may designate a female probation officer as commissioner in the first instance to hear and determine the disposition of any cases of females coming within the provisions of this act and make report thereof to the said judge, together with said commissioner's conclusions and recommendations. If no exceptions be taken to said report and no review be asked thereof, such report and recommendations may be confirmed by an order of said court, and, if confirmed, shall become the judgment of said court. A review by the court of the conclusions and recommendations of said commissioner may be had by any child, or the parent, guardian, or custodian of any child, who may feel aggrieved at the report of said commissioner by filing a request for review thereof at any time within three days after notice of the finding of said commissioner. Immediately upon the entry of said commissioner's finding the clerk of the court shall notify the parent, guardian, or custodian of the child personally or by registered mail, giving the substance of said finding. Such parent, guardian, or custodian shall be presumed to have had actual notice of such finding 24 hours after said notice shall have been deposited in the mail by said clerk, addressed to such parent, guardian, or custodian at his last known place of residence.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Section 8 of the bill provides that the report of a female probation officer, acting as a commissioner, may be adopted, if no exceptions be taken, and may be confirmed by the court, and, if confirmed, shall become the judgment of the court. Is that limited to the report of a female probation officer acting as a commissioner, or is it extended to probation officers in general, without regard to sex, or whether they deal with boys or girls?

Mr. TINKHAM. The committee intended that that should be limited to female cases, and the language seems sufficiently explicit. It says:

That the judge of the juvenile court may designate a female probation officer as commissioner in the first instance to hear and determine the disposition of any cases of females coming within the provisions of this act and make report thereof to the said judge, together with said commissioner's conclusions and recommendations. If no exceptions be taken to said report and no review be asked thereof, such report and recommendations may be confirmed by an order of said court, and, if confirmed, shall become the judgment of said court.

It seems to me that that language clearly and specifically limits it to female cases alone.

Mr. GARD. I understand that; but why should it be so limited? Why may not a probation officer having in charge a boy make a report to the court and have his recommendation acted upon, just as a woman having in charge a girl would have her recommendation acted upon by the court?

Mr. TINKHAM. The reason for the provision in cases of females and not in cases of males, is this: It was thought to be a good public policy to cause the court itself to investigate all cases, to sit upon each case, and to be brought as closely as possible in contact with every case that was brought before it; but it was thought there might be some special cases in relation to females where it would be better for a woman to make the investigation and report to the judge. In other words, it was thought with a female some cases might be an exception to the sound and beneficent rule that the court should not delegate authority, but dispose and handle with original knowledge as many cases as possible.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that this language limits the consideration by the judge of the juvenile court? Is he compelled under the law to submit female cases to a female commissioner and to adopt her report unless some exception is taken to it by some one?

Mr. SISSON. The language of section 8, beginning in line 8, is—

That the judge of the juvenile court may.

In other words, it is left entirely discretionary with him whether he will appoint, in a female case, a female commissioner or not.

Mr. GARD. I think the idea is very good. I am decidedly in favor of having the cases of girls investigated by women; but I was inquiring as to whether or not the same power of investigation and report existed in the case of a probation officer who was a man who had charge of a case of a boy who might be dependent or delinquent.

Mr. TINKHAM. Section 8 provides that that examination may be made in the case of females alone, and as I stated, it was thought better policy to devolve upon the court as much responsibility of original disposition of cases and investigation as possible, but thought there might be exceptional cases in relation to females. Therefore, there was no provision made that in male cases the court might delegate this authority, because if there was general authority given to the court to delegate authority in all cases, some judge might take an opportunity to delegate practically all of his power of original investigation, which would not be in accordance with the sound policy of American court procedure.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Section 9 does confer the authority which the gentleman says it does not.

Mr. TINKHAM. Only in regard to females.

Mr. MADDEN. No. It says:

It shall be the duty of the chief probation officer to make or cause to be made such an investigation of the child as may be required by the court.

Mr. TINKHAM. The distinction is this: The probation officer is making the investigation outside of the court. In other words, he has to go out and obtain witnesses and evidence, whereas in the case of the female under section 8 the investigation is a judicial procedure, and it devolves upon the deputy.

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing in section 9 that says the investigation is to be outside the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to answer the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TINKHAM. In answer to the honorable Representative from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who sees no distinction in the bill in relation to these several cases, I call his attention to this. He will notice in section 8 that the female probation officer can make an examination in relation to the female case and can draw conclusions and make recommendations. Now, in section 9 there is no provision that the male probation officer shall draw conclusions or make recommendations; in other words, find the facts and make the finding in the case. The probation officer in section 9 merely brings to the court the evidence. In other words, he is the court's eyes and legs in the investigation of the case in the field; so the distinction is clear. In the one case, in the case of the female, the case may be heard by the female probation officer who will hear the evidence, draw conclusions, make recommendations, but under section 9 there is a male probation officer who can only make investigations and bring the information which he may obtain to the judge for his consideration and disposal.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I got the floor for the purpose of asking a few questions myself, but if the gentleman's question is short I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. What I wanted to know is why it is that there should not be the same method of procedure in the case of boys that is to be pursued in the case of girls?

Mr. SISSON. I presume the answer the gentleman gave a moment ago, when he was asked practically the same question, is the true one—that in many cases it might be that the matter would be of a delicate nature, and the information gotten by a woman would be very much fuller and more easily obtained than if the girl was taken before the court. But that is an exceptional case, where the girl has been brought in and jurisdiction obtained. In the case of the boy, the other officer goes around and, as the gentleman from Massachusetts says, is the eyes and legs of the court.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not see why it is not as necessary to look after boys as it is after girls.

Mr. SISSON. As I said, in the case of a girl it might be a delicate matter, and she would be more apt to answer more readily a woman than she would a man.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not at all the matter I was asking about.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the language on page 6, where you only give 24 hours for notice to the parent or guardian. In the event that the finding by the female commissioner becomes final and from which there can be no appeal in 24 hours, does not the gentleman think that is rather short notice to make a finding of the commissioner final with no appeal?

Mr. TINKHAM. I should say if the honorable Representative from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] wanted to submit the amendment that there would be no objection to extending the time.

Mr. SISSON. Here is a girl in the District of Columbia, and the parent or guardian may live at some distant portion of the United States. That would be a very rare case, but I see no necessity for such undue haste and making the female commissioner's finding final. The girl may be away from home and here without the knowledge of the parents or guardian. Now, in the event that the commissioner makes a finding against the girl, a letter posted would not reach the parent or guardian until the time for appeal had expired. I would suggest that you make it not less than three days.

Mr. MADDEN. Ten days.

Mr. SISSON. Or even, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, 10 days.

Mr. TINKHAM. Could we not compromise on five days?

Mr. SISSON. I think in five days it would reach any portion of the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any reason why the court should not have the right to review this at any time? Why should it be final at all? Why should not the court of its own motion have a right at any time to review any of these findings? It seems to me that if this is to be final the court should have such right.

Mr. TINKHAM. The bill provides that there may be a revision of the finding of the deputy and that the court may make a change of guardianship at any time, and a complete appeal is allowed to the court of appeals or to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia upon any finding or change of guardianship. That has been thoroughly safeguarded.

Mr. DOWELL. If that is true, that fully answers my question.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 6, line 3, by inserting "five days" instead of "24 hours."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, lines 3 and 4, strike out "24 hours" and insert in lieu thereof "five days."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 5, line 22, by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "five," so as to make it correspond with the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 22, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "five."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I ask if the language in section 8, described by the gentleman having charge of the bill, is intended to be a delegation of authority from the court to this so-called female commissioner acting as a probation officer? It seems to me that it is an avowed delegation of authority, taking the place of the court and actually conferring it upon the commissioner.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD], I would say that no more is allowed in this case than is allowed in a court of equity where the court desires, for some particular reason—because, perhaps, the facts are abstruse or complicated—to have a commissioner appointed to find the facts and make a finding, but reserves to itself the important thing, namely, the making of the final decision. This is no delegation of authority, except so far as it is limited to the finding of the facts and making recommendatiozs, subject to the approval or disapproval of the court.

Mr. GARD. It provides that if no exceptions be taken and review be asked that the report may be confirmed by an order of the court.

Mr. TINKHAM. In other words, it gives the judge complete discretion either to accept the facts as found or not. He has final discretion and decision of the case, and it seems to me that in a juvenile court there might be certain rigors of law and certain niceties of technical proceedure which, if they did not affect fundamental rights and absolute human rights, might well be dispensed with.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That service of summons within the District of Columbia shall be made personally by delivering to and leaving with the person summoned a true copy thereof. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that reasonable but unsuccessful effort has been made to serve summons personally upon the parties named therein, other than said child, the court, at any stage of the proceedings, may pass an order providing for substitute service by delivering a copy of the summons or a supplemental summons to some person above the age of 16 years residing on the premises where the said child may be found, or where he or she may live; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that any of the parties, other than said child named in said summons, are without the District of Columbia, service may be made by registered mail, by publication, or personally without the District of Columbia, in such manner and at such time before the hearing as may be directed in said order. It shall be sufficient to confer jurisdiction if service is effected at any time before the time fixed in the summons or supplemental summons for the return thereof, but the court, if requested, shall not proceed with the hearing earlier than the third day after the day of the service. Proof of service shall be made substantially as in other courts of record. Failure to serve summons upon any person, other than said child, shall not impair the jurisdiction of the court to proceed in cases arising under subdivision (a) of section 4: Provided, That for good cause shown the court make an order dispensing with such service. The summons shall be considered a mandate of the court, and willful failure to obey its requirements shall subject any person guilty thereof to liability for punishment as for a contempt.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 8, line 9, by striking out the word "sixteen" and inserting the word "twenty-one."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 9, strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty-one."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the reason for the amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this part of the bill where it proposes to deliver a copy of a summons or a supplementary summons to a person residing on the premises where the child may be found should not be extended to authorize constructive service to one of the age of 16 years. I would think that before a constructive service, such as this is, would be authorized that it should be upon one of the commonly accepted age of maturity.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think I have no objection to that.

Mr. SISSON. Suppose there is no one there over that age? Suppose the only person living to be had would be 16 years of age?

Mr. GARD. Then I do not think a person 16 years of age should accept service in the juvenile court for a person 17 years of age or close to 17. Under this law it is provided that a person of the age of 16 may constructively accept service for one who may be nearly 17 years of age.

Mr. SISSON. Let me see if I have in mind what is intended to be done. Suppose a 14-year-old child is reported to the court and taken to court. This is for the purpose of notifying somebody at the place of residence?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I suppose that person ought to be a relative or the mother or the father or some one 21 years of age; but in the event that there was no one there at the place who could testify to the habits and what the child had been doing, it seems to me that it is simply extending to the child a little additional protection against any summary proceeding. Suppose the child is of tender years, such person then might give information to the friends of the child about what proceedings are going on. I agree with the gentleman that if there is anyone over 21 years of age——

Mr. GARD. Or of the age of 21 years.

Mr. SISSON. That they ought to be the ones to be served; but in the event that there was no one over 21 years of age, then the 16-year provision ought to remain.

Mr. GARD. I fail to see that there would be anything gained where a person had to appear in the juvenile court by authorizing a constructive service or an acceptance of summons, whichever it may be termed, by some one who is younger than the person cited into court, and it seems to me that if there is no one of competent authority to act, this question of constructive service, or acceptance of summons, ought not at all to be considered by the juvenile court. The real gist of the matter is, after all, to have the child brought before the court.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that.

Mr. GARD. And the mere fact of the acceptance of service, as I view it, is a technicality which in any event bears but little for the good of the individual child, and while I am not insistent upon it, my own view is that any constructive service or acceptance of summons ought to be made by some one who has the power to accept, and I do not think a 16-year-old person would have.

Mr. SISSON. I can see that the committee might possibly have had in mind a child actually in the custody of the court, and the court finding one of 16 years of age at his home, and by serving the summons on the 16-year-old boy or girl, that act might lead to the discovery of the whereabouts of somebody who was closer to the child even than a 16-year-old individual, and in that way bring to the defense of the child in the event that it was not treated properly—because we are not presuming that these courts are to be infallible——

Mr. GARD. Certainly not.

Mr. SISSON. It might be a little additional protection to the child, but I do think that there ought to be a provision here if there is a person over 21 years of age residing there that the service should be made upon them and not upon one under 16 years of age. I suppose what the gentleman has in mind is that they should not select a 16-year-old person when there is one 21 years of age there.

Mr. GARD. I think that should not be allowed to be done, because I am thoroughly of opinion there should be no constructive acceptance of service of a person who in ordinary litigation would not be accepted.

Mr. SISSON. And as a question of law could not be under the law of most of the States——

Mr. GARD. No.

Mr. SISSON. Constructive service can not be had on children. It has to be in accordance with regular notice and regular proceeding, and after you proceed against a child, in most of the States, you have to appoint a guardian ad litem.

Mr. GARD. And the guardian ad litem must be a person appointed by the court.

Mr. SISSON. This particular case is not in accordance with the fixed rules of common or statutory law that now obtain throughout the States, so I would suggest——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, or I rise in opposition to the amendment, whichever is the parliamentary procedure. I have no desire to offer an amendment. I was just suggesting something to cure the defect in the gentleman's mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in line 20, page 8, I move to strike out the word "third" and insert in place thereof the word "fifth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 20, strike out the word "third" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifth."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this only allows a party living outside the District, if notice of a summons has been brought to a parent or guardian, to have the hearing postponed and give them sufficient time to get here, and I think that should be at least five days.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that if this amendment of his changing the word "third" to "fifth" will prevail, extending the time of the hearing, that upon a mere request the juvenile court could not hear a case within three days, but would be compelled to wait five days, and would it not be the iden of the gentleman that these cases ought to be heard as soon as possible, both for the protection of the children and the protection of the State or the district in which the child lives?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in reply I will say that is so; but it might be—and I understand it is contemplated by this section—that the parent or guardian might be living outside the District of Columbia and that notice of service might be had by registered mail, and it might be impossible for them to get here within three days. This is only effective where the request is made, and I assume that the request must be made by the party upon whom the service by registered mail is had.

Mr. GARD. I am not in any way opposing the gentleman's motion, for I think we all desire to have the bill perfected; I think it means that if requested the court shall not proceed with a hearing earlier than the fifth day after the day of service if the amendment were adopted, and I do not think it is a proper amendment, but I think the hearing ought to be as soon as possible and should not be extended to the fifth day. I will not go so far as to say it should be limited to the third day, but clearly it ought not to be extended to the fifth day after the beginning of service.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is right, that there should not be in many of these cases anything but a summary hearing, and that to extend the hearing to the fifth day would perhaps compel the postponement of cases in which the merits would be seriously involved and hurt; so I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman would not insist that if the child's parent lived at a distance that the hearing should proceed without giving that parent an opportunity to be present, and if it was impossible for him to be here in three days and he requested that the hearing be put off for a day so he could get here he would not insist that the hearing should go forward without the parent or the guardian of the child having an opportunity to be here?

Mr. TINKHAM. I should not. But in legislation, it seems to me, you often have to balance one interest against another interest. Now, the preponderant number of cases, probably nearly all of the cases that would come before the court, would be cases of children whose parents lived in the District of Columbia. Therefore the eye of the legislature should not be fixed upon the exceptional case. Under this section the judge need not proceed with the hearing at the end of three days, and undoubtedly would not compel the attendance of persons where the facts showed it would be a manifest injustice.

Again, I want to say that we are dealing with a juvenile court bill, not with a criminal court bill or even with a civil court bill, and the rigors and niceties of ordinary law should not be as carefully applied, but only procedure adopted with the idea in view of accomplishing the result desired, namely, the salvation, protection, and preservation to the State of children by means as flexible as possible put into the hands of such a judge as should be appointed to such a court.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask the gentleman this: If this clause is not put into this bill for the express purpose of preventing any injustice being done any child, because after the parent shall have received this notice or summons he shall be allowed to request them not to proceed within three days. Now, suppose, for example, in one case in a thousand or ten thousand or fifty thousand it should happen the parent of the child was in California, or in the State of the gentleman, and it was not possible for him to get there until the fourth day. I am inclined to believe that the gentleman who offers the amendment is correct, because it is only after request and it is only in these particular cases the gentleman speaks of, only in those cases where by taking summary action there would be any protest likely against proceeding at once, and in that event the parent would make a request for the court to wait so as to give him an opportunity to get here to the trial in which his child is involved, and therefore it seems to me that the two extra days would not work any hardship upon anyone, and it seems to me that the gentleman who offered the amendment is correct in his position which he takes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the court shall have power, upon the hearing of any case involving any child, to exclude the general public from the room wherein said hearing is held, admitting thereto only such persons as may have a direct interest in the case; and the records of all cases may be withheld from indiscriminate public inspection, in the discretion of the court; but such records shall be open to inspection of such child, his parents, guardians, or his authorized representatives. The hearings may be conducted in the judge's chambers, and such cases shall not be heard in conjunction with the other business of the court.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of section 15, beginning with line 21, the following words:

And the records of all cases may be withheld from indiscriminate public inspection, in the discretion of the court; but such records shall be open to inspection of such child, his parents, guardians, or his authorized representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

"And the records of all cases may be withheld from indiscriminate public inspection, in the discretion of the court; but such records shall be open to inspection of such child, his parents, guardians, or his authorized representatives."

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the court excluding from the courtroom a curious crowd, but I am unalterably opposed to any court of this free country keeping a secret record of its proceedings. It has been a policy in this Government from its foundation that there should be no star-chamber proceedings, and in order that the public might know what the court has done there is no better way of having the court do right than by its knowing that the record itself is going to be reviewed. Now, in those individual cases there might not be much harm done, but the very moment we begin to ingraft upon the statutes of the country the principle that the Federal courts may keep their records a secret, we are taking a step that may rise up as a precedent to do us great harm in the future.

Mr. DILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. DILL. What purpose will be served by keeping the records, if ordinary action is taken against children, from being made public?

Mr. SISSON. The idea, of course, in the committee's mind would be, I think, that there would be no record that might in any way affect the child's standing in the future. I presume that was in their mind. But I am perfectly willing that the court in particular cases, and many of the States do that now, should exclude a curious crowd from the actual hearing of the testimony of the witnesses and the actual trial. But even such cases should be rare, indeed. But as to the results reached in such case, as to what the court has actually done, as to its judgment, I do not know of a single exception anywhere in any liberty-loving country. Records ought always to be open for inspection, and I am unwilling that there should be a precedent wherein the future Congress may determine to take this precedent, and say, where a labor organization may become interested and doubly interested in the disposition of a laboring man's case, that they shall have the right to exclude not only the people from the hearing on the ground, for example, that not to do so might stir up the mob, but would have the right even to prevent the public from investigating the record of the case and what the court has done in reference to that particular case. It is a long step in the wrong direction. I commend the committee for leaving it to the discretion of the court as to whether or not the court shall admit in the court room the curious gaze of the people. But I believe this other is a step in the wrong direction. So, if it was left in the bill, this clause alone will cause me to vote against it, because I feel that we do not want to begin any star-chamber proceedings in any of our courts.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to offer a substitute to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SISSON. I yield for the purpose of hearing the gentleman's substitute.

Mr. MADDEN. I move as a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi the following:

Strike out the words, in line 22, page 9, "withheld from indiscriminate" and insert "open to."

And strike out the words, in line 22, "in the" and in line 23, "discretion of the court," so that it would read: "And the records of all cases may be open to public inspection, but such records shall be open to inspection of such child"—

And so forth.

Mr. SISSON. Then your second clause would not be necessary at all—

But such records shall be open to inspection of such child—

And so forth.

Mr. MADDEN. It will read:

And the records of all cases may be open to public inspection.

And then follows:

But such records shall be open to inspection of such child, by its parents, guardians—

And so forth. It may be open to the public.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. The thing that I have particularly in mind is that I do not like this precedent. I am unwilling that any court record should be closed to any man who wants to inspect it. Not while I have my present mind will I ever agree that the proceedings of any court dealing with the rights of the people shall be made secret. I shall not put myself in a position where I am willing to yield to the discretion of the court the question as to whether or not it is willing to have its own findings and proceedings open for the people to see what the court has done in any case affecting the rights of a man, much less a child.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Suppose, for example, it is one of your own children that was being brought up before this court. Would you not like to have those records kept almost secret?

Mr. SISSON. It might be my desire to do it, but it would not be for the good of the public that it be done. It is the public interest that I am serving here.

Mr. McCRACKEN. But it would be best for the child, would it not?

Mr. SISSON. It might or it might not. I believe any sort of deception is wrong.

Mr. McCRACKEN. But this is not deception, when it is done in the interest of children who do not know their own minds.

Mr. SISSON. On the same reasoning it would be for the interest of every man charged with crime—every thief, rogue, and burglar in this country—that you keep absolutely from public knowledge the fact that he has committed a crime, because it would hurt his future. The public is always best served when the courts are open to the public, for judges in the past have only been men and are subject to the same frailties of men of the past, and experience teaches them the power should be exercised in the open. I am willing that the court in control shall exclude from the court room where the witnesses are being examined as to details of immorality, the curious crowd, but when its finding shall be made and a judgment entered I want that record to be a public record, and I do not want any secret record kept in the courts of my country. This bill ought to become a model law, and it ought to be a model bill for the States of the Union in the event they take this step, and I do not want that principle to be engrafted on the laws of my country at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I fail to fully appreciate the differentiation that my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] makes between admitting the public to the hearings and admitting the public to the full inspection of the record. If it is any harm to admit the public to the hearing, it may be equally harmful to admit the public indiscriminately to the record; and if everything ought to be wide open, if there ought to be no secrecy, if there ought to be no effort to protect the child from the public knowledge, then we ought not to have any secrecy about the hearings.

Now, to say that the record should be so kept that the party interested should not inspect it would be one thing, but that is not what is provided by this bill. The party interested has the right under the bill to inspect the record. But why should you invite a man who, perhaps, is trying to find some girl to perpetrate an outrage upon to inspect the records? Many children everywhere do things thoughtlessly—sometimes with full intent—that ought not to be heralded to the world, that ought not be held against them. If there is any man in this Chamber who thinks over his own life and can not remember some incident of his life which never became public, but which, if it had become public, might have practically ruined his life, he is an exception. He ought not to be on this earth; he ought to be translated bodily to heaven.

I am in favor of giving the children all the protection you can, and I think that with the authority we confer upon the juvenile court here for the protection of the child, that the child, or its parents, guardians, or representative, may inspect the record, we might wisely leave to the court the authority to make the record secret, so far as the general public is concerned, and not require the record to show what we do not permit the public to hear at the hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment will not be accepted. The amendment is a deadly thrust at the very principle, at the very foundation of this bill. It is a murderous thrust at the whole idea involved, because if the records can be indiscriminately inspected and used against the juvenile, the protection and the purpose of the law have been lost.

Now, what is the principle involved? The principle involved in this bill is the salvage of the child, the protection of its best interests, and the child itself. The principle is to make the child have self-respect after it has stumbled, after it has made a mistake. It is to make the child an American citizen without stain, so that no one in its future may point the finger of scorn at it. The very vital principle of the bill is the theory that no criminality attaches to any act committed by a child less than 17 years of age; that is, some act short of the highest and greatest moral turpitude, in which case a juvenile court takes no jurisdiction.

Now, if the records of this court are made public, as the honorable Representative from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has well said, why not have the proceedings made public? If you are going to have one made public, why not have the other? Neither should be made public to carry out the principle and purpose involved in this legislation. When you talk about secrecy, this bill does not provide for secrecy. It provides in terms only against indiscriminate publicity. It says that the records may be withheld; it does not say that they must be withheld. Withheld from what? From indiscriminate publicity in the discretion of the court. It provides that the records shall not be withheld, even by the judge himself, from inspection by the child itself, the guardian, or an authorized representative.

Now, that, I submit, is not secrecy, and it should not be put upon that basis and so denominated. The provision, in accordance with its terms, is a provision against indiscriminate publicity. Why is this provision made? For the preservation of the child, his reputation, and his dignity. Will you assault that or will you protect it? Will you do what you can to help to make him have self-respect, or will you do what you can to besmirch him and his future and debase rather than exalt him? Will you pass a juvenile-court bill for the District of Columbia which shall be such a model that the States of the Union shall pattern after it because its every provision carries out the principle of the conservation of the child, of his reputation, his life, and happiness or not? I sincerely trust that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire accord with the statement made by the gentleman of the committee [Mr. TINKHAM]. It seems to me that to open wide the doors of public inspection indiscriminately, even disinterested inspection, possibly would serve but one of two purposes. It would either pander to the curious or it would actually promote the interests of the vicious.

I believe, and have always believed, that the province of the juvenile court is that it shall be a court not of accusation, a court not of punishment, but a court to help the boy and the girl; and there is no better way to help a boy or a girl than to preserve inviolate that child's reputation in the community. And so, if you open wide the doors of public inspection of these documents and records to anyone who from the most evil motives, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has suggested, might seek to know the past life of a girl in order that by threats and duress she might afterwards be dragged into a life of shame, you depart from the scope of anything that can have for its effect the protection of our boys and girls. I think there is no stronger feature in this juvenile court law than that which places the records of the court showing what the court has done and the complaints made and the proceedings thereunder under the fair discretion of the judge, because it is assumed that no judge will be put into the control of the destiny of the lives of boys and girls unless he is a man competent to act with fairness and integrity and with the most disinterested honesty of motives, and only to such a man, Mr. Chairman, may safely be intrusted the records of his own court.

Such an inspection of the private lives of boys and girls ought not to be permitted. The object of the bill is not, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] seems to suppose, a tendency in the direction of secrecy in court proceedings. It is rather intended to open wide the door of humanity for the conservation of boys and girls.

Mr. DILL. I move to strike out the last word. I hope very much that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] will not prevail. I come from a State where a juvenile court law is in operation, and as a member of the prosecuting attorney's force of my county I have had something to do with juvenile court work. I believe that work has been a success, and the chief factor in its success in my judgment is the fact that the records and the hearings of that court are not open to the public in general. I do not mean that they can not be reached by those who ought to reach them, but I do mean that when a hearing is had on the case of some boy or girl a curious newspaper man, for instance, can not come in and get the record and publish it broadcast and report the results of that hearing to the world. I believe also that the very fact that the children know that the world is not to know what is taking place there has its influence to make them better. It seems to me the gentleman from Mississippi entirely misunderstands the purpose of a juvenile court when he holds out the idea that it should be conducted publicly and that its records should be open the same as those of another court. In the drafting of this bill the whole purpose was to give a special corrective institution that would be different from the ordinary court. For that reason it seems to me it would be a most serious mistake, that it would destroy one of the very underlying purposes of the bill, if everything done in the court should be public and open, like the things that are done in other courts. We use the term "court" here in a different sense than it is generally used. We use it simply as a name applied to a proceeding held in the interest of the child rather than in the interest of the public.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I will take the floor in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Having known for a brief time only the splendid gentleman who has offered this amendment [Mr. SISSON], I am sure that down in his big and humane heart he has not quite caught the purpose proposed in this bill. I am sure that if he were the juvenile judge who we hope will soon fill this position—a position which I believe is the most important of all the offices that will be held in the District of Columbia—if he were that judge, and some unfortunate boy or girl should be brought before him, and he should pass on the case, and some curious, morbid, diseased mind should attempt to probe into the affairs of that child's life, he himself would be the first to put his hand over the record for the sake of the child. This is the very core and heart of the modern movement for the State doing all that it can toward preserving and saving children, not only from themselves, but from the work of diseased mentalities who live upon the scum of moral life, just as the buzzard lives on the carrion of the field. It is time in this country that such movements as this should be inaugurated, and there is no better place from which it should come than the Congress of the United States, where we shall speak through this juvenile court bill, saying that hereafter, as far as it is possible, every unfortunate child who because of any reason must come into this court and must be cared for and directed in some way shall be sheltered and guided and made conscious of that shelter while there. When an unfortunate person was brought into the presence of the great Nazarene, He said, "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone," and that is the only case on record where the accused party was declared not guilty by the jury adjourning one at a time. [Applause.] This is Christian legislation, if we understand the teachings of Jesus at all. I believe that the author of this amendment [Mr. SISSON] has missed the point and purpose of this proposed law, and that if he sat on that bench, he would stop the curious from prying into the affairs of children for the purpose of harming them thereafter. I believe he would place his hand over that record, and I hope that his great, big, generous heart will cause him to ask for the withdrawal of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. I move to strike out the last two words. Gentlemen, I have children of my own, and I love my children above anything in this world. No man sympathizes more than I do with the unfortunate adult criminal. No one sympathizes more than I do with any man who is unfortunate; but if the history of the past teaches us anything, it is that the records of court proceedings should not be kept secret by the judge. So far as the evidence that is taken is concerned in a few cases, it is not heard by a curious crowd, and it does not become a part of the permanent court record. It does not appear in the judgment of the court; but we do not want to keep secret the judgment of a court on any proposition.

Every argument that has been made here in reference to the protection of the reputation of a child may also be made in reference to the protection of the unfortunate criminal of mature years. If that reason is carried to its last analysis, it closes every criminal record in the United States, if it is followed. There is no way to judge the future except by the past, and it is hard for men to learn except by experience. You can not teach people anything as an abstract proposition. They must learn by experience, and the experience of mankind has shown that the secret findings of judges who deal with the liberties of men, women, and children have inured to the awful hurt of mankind. In this particular case, much as it may appeal to the sympathy of your hearts, much as it may appeal to our feelings which go out to unfortunate childhood, there is a principle involved in this matter which is that the proceedings of the court should not be made secret.

I want no star-chamber proceedings in any court in America. If to put upon the record the fact that a certain child had been committed to a guardian selected by the court, if that of itself shall ruin and damage the child, then, when he is 22 years old, to render a judgment against him that he has been convicted will damage the man at 22. It will damage the man at 25. Is it the criminal you are most interested in? Certainly not; it is society. I do not have in my heart the feeling that the punishment is for the good always of the criminal, nor do we manifest an Indian's vengeance on the criminal when you try him to ascertain whether he has observed the rules of law. It is for the humane purpose of deterring other people from violating the law and it is for the good of society that we maintain that the law should be observed. It is better that a man who violates the law should be punished than that you should abrogate all law, and for that reason, when you apply the reasoning that you apply here out of the tenderness of your hearts, without the exercise of judgment, which is necessary in all legislation, you place yourself in a position where you lead yourself inevitably to the conclusion that all criminal proceedings shall be kept secret.

Mr. COLEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COLEMAN. Is not the very purpose of the juvenile court to prevent a record from being established against the child in a criminal court?

Mr. SISSON. Upon the same reasoning you ought never to permit a record to be made against any burglar.

Mr. COLEMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SISSON. A juvenile burglar of 17 would be tried in a juvenile court because he falls within this class, and you preserve the record as a secret, but when he is 18 or 19 you do not.

Mr. COLEMAN. If the criminal record is to be charged up against the child, you had better have no juvenile court, for it has lost its very purpose and object.

Mr. SISSON. If you are going to overturn all the established principles of liberty which the people in this country endeavored to establish, there should be no secrecy in reference to court proceedings.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has stated that he has no objection to the court having power to exclude spectators. Why is he not willing to grant a like discretion in reference to the inspection of a record?

Mr. SISSON. There are several reasons for the exclusion of spectators. One is for the good of the crowd that assembles, to see that they may not feed and feast on what may fall from the witnesses in some outrageous case. Another is that if it is a case where there is a great deal of feeling against the defendant it may protect him from mob violence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. You exclude them in order that you may prevent mob violence, but it is not that the proceedings shall be made secret for the benefit of the criminal. It is for the benefit of the community, and all the judgments and findings of the court should be public records. Take the ordinary judgment in court and it gives you no indication as to what the character of the evidence has been, but the court finds that certain facts are true, and the jury decides that certain facts are true, and render their verdict accordingly. Now, if this principle of secrecy shall apply, then every Federal court in a few years could say it is for the good of the community that what the judge has done shall not be known to the public; it is better for the public that the newspapers should not get at these records. In other words, it is best for society that men be spirited away and never know how or by what means it is done. Judges have not always been angels. Capital-controlled and corrupt judges would hail with delight such a rule. But the freedom of the press would be invaded. I had rather have the freedom of the press, with all the disadvantages the gentleman states, than to have it throttled. So do all scoundrels want secrecy. Honest men never do.

In the time of Lord Jeffreys there were men who thought that Jeffreys had the right to proceed in secret, and that it was for the good of the people of England. Ah, in this instance you would see gentlemen rise and say that it is for the good of the criminal that Jeffreys was proceeding against him secretly, it is for the good of society that he proceeds against him secretly; but after the people had suffered for years they provided that a man should be confronted with the witnesses, and in every State in the Union we make provision for open courts in order that the liberty and freedom of the people may be preserved, and that their servants may act in the open light of day.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that in his own State or in any other the court has no authority to seal and impound papers?

Mr. SISSON. There is none except in some States with reference to divorce proceedings, a purely civil matter, where the records may be kept secret, and except in cases where they have grand jurors, and those proceedings are kept secret in order to prevent the escape of the criminal. I do not know of one.

Mr. MANN. All grand-jury proceedings are secret.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and that is to prevent the escape of the criminal that is investigated.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not altogether.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman may say, "Oh, no" in a didactic way.

Mr. MANN. I was not reflecting upon the manner of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. And I am not reflecting upon the manner of the gentleman from Illinois. But there is another reason in the investigation before a grand jury; the witnesses are there to testify, and then the grand jury finds a presentment, and that presentment is sent into court and is filed, and as soon as the criminal is apprehended that becomes open for inspection. There is another reason why they keep the grand jury proceedings secret, and that is that they sometimes investigate a man on some charge and find that it is absolutely untrue and false. I do not know a State in the Union where the findings to deprive a man of his liberty or his property are not a part of the public record, or where he is convicted on any criminal charge where the verdict of the jury is not a part of the public record.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. I would like to say that in the State of New York the records of the grand jury are always secret.

Mr. SISSON. That is true in all of the States where there are grand juries.

Mr. SANFORD. Before and after an indictment, and always remain secret.

Mr. SISSON. Always.

Mr. SANFORD. Except when they are granted upon an order of the court.

Mr. SISSON. Always.

Mr. SANFORD. And I would like to say that the court always refuses to grant publicity, and I have only known of two cases where it has not.

Mr. SISSON. In my State the grand juror himself must be sworn to secrecy for 12 months after the apprehension of the criminal, and it can not do either the public or the criminal any harm for an inquisitorial body to investigate the gentleman or any other man in the community as to a violation of law. That is an inquisitorial body and not a trial court.

Mr. MANN. This is both.

Mr. SISSON. I do not object so far as the inquisitorial feature is concerned to that being secret, but I do object most seriously to the findings of the court remaining secret.

Mr. MANN. The findings are not the only record.

Mr. SISSON. That is true; but you take the testimony and the evidence in a divorce case, which, by the way, is a civil chancery proceeding, and it may well be kept secret; but in many cases where the court shall exclude the crowd from the jury room the court may not have all of the evidence copied, but the findings of the court—the result to the man who is being tried—are always known, and that is written down into the record so that every man can tell just exactly what has happened. If you shall keep secret the findings when a man shall go to the penitentiary or the farm, it would be absolutely within the power of the officer, if the findings are secret, to make the man serve indefinitely, as was the case before glorious America proclaimed the doctrine of publicity and permitted the open light of day to be let in on all our courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail, and that this section will be left as it is in the draft of the bill. We are not dealing with a simon-pure criminal court in this instance. It is a departure from the proceedings followed heretofore in criminal courts, or in courts heretofore established in this country. This is a correctional or disciplinary court.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Are not all courts correctional courts?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. SISSON. Then they are monstrous.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, discretion here is given to the judge of this court to exclude people from the hearing when the juvenile offender is before him, and I may say that we may well give him a like discretion in the matter of the inspection of the records, because if the judge of this court can be depended upon to exercise a discretion with reference to the attendance at the hearing, I feel he can likewise be depended upon to exercise that discretion wisely when it comes to an inspection of the record. This is a different method of dealing with children under the age of 17 years than has heretofore obtained in the District of Columbia, and I feel that we may well take the chance of establishing what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has stated would be a dangerous precedent, we may well take that chance for the benefit and the protection of the juvenile offender. This system has been tried in other jurisdictions with like safeguards and with like provisions, and I have yet to hear where there has been any hardship because the terms of the act under which the juvenile court in those States was established have been followed. I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will not prevail and that the judge of this court will be given this discretion which I have no doubt he will exercise wisely.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I join with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in the expression of the hope that this amendment will not prevail. I think it would very largely neutralize the whole purpose of the juvenile procedure. I was glad to hear him also say that this was not a criminal court. I do not like to hear the term "crime" applied to a child under 17 years of age. A new term has come into our phraseology since the juvenile procedure has been inaugurated, and that is the term "juvenile delinquency." We have adopted a new phase altogether in our procedure against those who step aside and violate the law where those offenders are children. The gentleman from Mississippi asked if all courts were not correctional. I would remind him that the law writers tell us that punishment has a threefold purpose. There is such a thing as protection to the public against the criminal. That is one purpose of punishment. There is also the purpose of example, that it may be an example to others not to do the same thing, but in this case there is the still farther-reaching purpose, and that is largely remedial, reformatory. I think all juvenile procedure regarding the violation of penal regulations by children should be specially remedial, not with a view so much of the public interest as with the hope of reforming the one who has stepped aside. If that be the purpose of this treatment of juvenile delinquency, then one of the things which it seems to me we ought not to do is to make it almost impossible for the delinquent to be reformed, because he will be treated after the incident occurs as a criminal. For that reason, it seems to me, these proceedings should not be made public. It is for the protection of the one who has offended, in order that he may carve out a career, after he has stepped aside, free from the publicity of the charge that has been made against him. For these reasons I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That no adjudication upon the status of any child under the provisions of this act shall operate as a disqualification for jury duty, for office, or for any other public service under the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, and such child shall not be denominated a criminal by reason of any such adjudication, nor shall such adjudication be denominated a conviction.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to section 14, which we have passed, with the consent of the gentleman, just for a question, where the provision relates to the appointment of a guardian ad litem. Is there included in the bill anything where there is any compensation for such guardian ad litem, or is he to be a friend to the court, or what is the status?

Mr. TINKHAM. There is not any provision in the bill that there be any compensation, but it was thought best that the appointment of a guardian ad litem be allowed by the court; that is, that the machinery be given to the court.

Mr. GARD. I understand that in the appointment of guardians ad litem usually there is some provision for their payment while acting as the guardian of the child, the same as the guardian of a child obtains compensation through the probate court while acting as guardian of the person and estate.

Mr. TINKHAM. There may be a guardian appointed under usual procedure in a probate or chancery court. The court may appoint a guardian who is a guardian "in persona," or the court may appoint a guardian of the estate. The guardian ad litem, who is appointed as the guardian of the estate, usually is compensated, because there is an estate from which he can be compensated and usually something for the guardian to do, service to be performed.

Mr. SISSON. I will state to the gentleman that also under the present laws of the District of Columbia they have what is called the Board of Children's Guardians, to whom this court commits all these children who have no natural guardian, and who is willing to take charge of them.

Mr. TINKHAM. And without relation to the appointment of a so-called guardian ad litem.

Mr. SISSON. The appointment of guardian ad litem would be only, I presume, in case where somebody is willing to assume that duty, because under the general laws of the District of Columbia they have what they call a Board of Children's Guardians, who would appear for the child in this case, and the law provides for them.

Mr. TINKHAM. The usual criminal court has a right in criminal procedure to nominate a member of the bar to defend a criminal, but there need not be any compensation given to that member of the bar. It was thought in this bill that mechanism should be provided for the court to appoint a guardian ad litem if it became necessary, either choose that guardian ad litem from the members of the bar or nominate some other person, so that the child would be represented pro forma by some one. It was merely a desire, so far as the record was concerned, to have the interest of the child represented pro forma if necessary. The provision is more technical than anything else, but is good legal form.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That until the first hearing of the case by the court a probation officer, or any other official only duly authorized so to do by the court, may release the child upon its own recognizance or promise, or upon the recognizance or promise of the parent or person having the custody, control, or supervision of the child, to appear before the court at such time as may be therein fixed or when notified. Any child embraced in this act shall have the right now given by law to any person to give bond or other security for appearance at the hearing of its case.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that in line 14, section 17, the word "promise" is wrongly spelled.

Mr. TINKHAM. The committee will take notice thereof. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the spelling of the word "promise," in line 14, will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That in all cases the nature of the proceeding shall be explained to said child and to the parents, custodian, or guardian; and between the time such child is taken into custody, with or without warrant, and the appearance of said child before the juvenile court, if not released, he shall be detained subject to the order of the court. The court may, in its discretion, in any case of a child brought before it, as herein provided, permit such child to be proceeded against in accordance with the laws that may be in force in the District of Columbia governing the commission of crimes, and in such case the petition, if any, filed under this act shall be dismissed and the matter shall be certified to the proper prosecuting officer for proceedings either in the police court or in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in accordance with law, which said courts are hereby vested with jurisdiction to try and enter judgments in any cases thus certified.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of this particular section. I desire to inquire of the gentleman having charge of the bill, the language in section 18, line 24, which recites the time the child is taken into custody, "with or without warrant." Section 11, page 7, as I have read the bill, provides that the first proceeding relative to the child being brought before the court is on the filing of a petition and thereupon a summons shall issue requiring the child to appear before the court. I do not know whether we intend in this bill to use the word "warrant" and I want to inquire whether it has been inadvertently used, or whether it is desired to insert this process of a criminal warrant.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think that the point of the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is well taken. I do not think the word "warrant" should be used, so I move that, in line 24, the word "warrant" be stricken out and in place thereof there be inserted the word "summons."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 24, strike out the word "warrant" and insert in lieu thereof the word "summons."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is it proposed to make the word "summons" mean taking personal custody of a person? In endeavoring to escape the ordinary meaning of the word "warrant," is it proposed now to insert the word "summons" to mean the same thing?

Mr. TINKHAM. Perhaps it would be better to substitute the word "process," which would cover this proceeding.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of saying "with or without warrant"? Why is it not sufficient to say "and between the time such child is taken into custody and the appearance," and so forth?

Mr. GARD. That would appear to me to be the better construction.

Mr. TINKHAM. I would not object if the honorable Representative from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. GARD. I do.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out, in line 24, page 10, the words "with or without warrant."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10 line 24, strike out the words "with or without warrant."

Mr. SISSON. Then what would be the process of taking custody of the child?

Mr. MANN. Whatever the process is the language "with or without warrant" does not mean anything. If a child is to be taken into custody there must be some authorization for that, and it is not necessary to say what the authorization is here, because it is merely descriptive.

Mr. SISSON. Suppose a child and its parents should resist taking him in custody without a warrant?

Mr. MANN. That is provided elsewhere. The authority to take the child is not provided for in this section.

Mr. SISSON. That is true. Where is it provided for that the child shall be taken into custody?

Mr. MANN. In section 11.

Mr. SISSON. The only manner provided is by a process issued by the court. I do not insist on the word "warrant," but you will have to be extremely clear as to that provision.

Mr. MANN. This language, of course, does not give any authority to take into custody. It only provides that where the child is taken into custody such and such shall happen.

Mr. SISSON. If you strike out "warrant," or whatever you call it, but which has the same effect as "warrant," to take into custody a child, you may get into all sorts of complications with reference to the method of taking the child, with possibility of damages against the officer. The protection to the officer is the fact always that he has a warrant ordering him to go and take into custody so-and-so.

Mr. MANN. Section 12 of the bill provides that if the court thinks the welfare of the child requires that it shall be taken into custody he shall indorse, or cause to be indorsed, upon the summons a direction that the officer serving the same shall at once take said child into custody. That is not under this section at all.

Mr. SISSON. Under another section of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That a suitable place for the temporary detention of children coming within the provisions of this act shall be established, equipped, and maintained under the direction of the Board of Children's Guardians entirely apart from any place of confinement of adults. Suitable arrangements may be made for the instruction of all children under such temporary detention, and to that end the Board of Children's Guardians and the Board of Education of the District of Columbia are authorized and empowered to arrange for the necessary teachers for said children. In no case shall any child coming within the provisions of this act be detained in or committed to a jail, common lockup, or other place where such child can come in contact at any time or in any manner with adults convicted or under arrest.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman having charge of the bill. You seem here to create a new activity under the juvenile court, and my inquiry is directed toward how large this establishment is to be, and what is to be the cost of it, and its general activity. In section 19 you provide for a temporary place or home for the detention of these children.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the present situation in the District of Columbia is this, that there is a so-called house of detention, and in that house are held women—criminals and juveniles. Now, to-day the following facts are true in relation to this house of detention.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me one moment, to save him some trouble as well as to get some information myself? I notice, on page 28, in section 45, of the bill you propose to abolish what is now known as the house of detention under the Metropolitan police and divert the appropriation in the District appropriation bill to this home that you establish by section 19.

Mr. TINKHAM. Exactly.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Now, is it the purpose of the gentleman to make this home—I judge it is entirely, from the language—for juveniles who are subject to the jurisdiction of the juvenile court?

Now, has the gentleman considered the fact that in section 45, when he diverts the appropriation in the District appropriation bill from the house of detention, that he does not leave any place for the adult people in the District whom it may be necessary to detain in a house of detention?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question of the honorable Representative from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] and so that the House may understand the situation, I desire to say that there is now in the District of Columbia a house of detention, that this house of detention is used interchangeably for all female offenders of whatsoever age and all juveniles under the jurisdiction of the juvenile court, and that the total maintenance expense of that institution is $18,000, or that was the expense in 1914—to be exact, $18,690; and I am sure if the change is made as contemplated in the bill before the House that the cost of maintenance of the house of detention will be reduced one-half. This statement has been made to me by the present judge of the juvenile court. The District Commissioners have informed me that there can be provided in the central police station, or in some of the precinct station houses, a room or rooms for all female adult persons, so that by making the change proposed in the bill you will establish a separate house of detention for juveniles, thus carrying out the principle of removing juveniles from all contact or touch with crime, and at the same time reduce expenses and take care of your adult female offenders who are now mingled with the juveniles, by placing them in the central police station or some of the precinct station houses.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I understand, of course, what the purpose of section 19 is and in the abolition of the present house of detention in which delinquent juveniles are now detained, and by section 45 transferring them, and this section now created by section 19 of this bill I have no doubt, and I am free to say to the gentleman of the committee in charge of this bill that arrangements can be made by the Metropolitan police in the police stations or elsewhere for the detention of those adults who are now kept in the house of detention temporarily. And I want to say to the gentlemen now, not as a prophet or the son of a prophet, that under section 19, while he says he is assured that the expenses involved by this piece of legislation will not be more than half or less than $10,000 annually, half of that for the present house of detention, that, in my judgment, he need not deceive himself, nor need the committee deceive itself, but that instead of costing half that now paid for the expenses of the house of detention it will cost double that paid for the house of detention within a very short time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Does not my friend from North Carolina think he is making a rash statement? Why does not the gentleman accept the bluff offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the judge of the juvenile court, and put in the appropriation bill shortly coming in half the amount?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. In the appropriation bill he will certainly put half the amount if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated that it will cost twice as much, but he will have to admit on the floor that he is not appropriating half as much.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. And I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I can say when I bring the District appropriation bill on the floor that with $9,000 or $10,000 I have given them what they asked for, because the judge of this court has also made me the same assurance that he has the gentleman in charge of this bill, going so far as to make his schedule.

And I assure you—I did not assure him—that I shall allow it. But the gentleman who happens to have charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill at some future time will find under this item, as I have found under the juvenile-court item that I have had under consideration for several years, instead of $10,000 a very much larger sum of money.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that the following statistics, as I understand it, are correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to yield the floor if the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman now.

Mr. TINKHAM. I understand that the following statistics are correct, as I have before stated.

There are in the house of detention an average each day of 7 children, and there are 21 people employed to carry on this establishment. Now, it would seem that it would be a measure of economy alone to change the character of management of the house of detention and establish a house of detention separate and apart for the children. This system of separating all juveniles from contact with others who have come in collusion with the law is the policy of 12 States of this Union. Thus there are 12 States in the Union which, by statutory provision, establish a house of detention separate and apart from all others for juveniles.

I sincerely hope that this section will be adopted, not only in view of the economy which may follow, but also because it is the policy of 12 exceptionally socially advanced States.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 11, section 19, the following language, beginning after the period on line 17:

Suitable arrangements may be made for the instruction of all children under such temporary detention, and to that end the Board of Children's Guardians and the Board of Education of the District of Columbia are authorized and empowered to arrange for the necessary teachers for said children.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 11, line 17, by striking out the following language: "Suitable arrangements may be made for the instruction of all children under such temporary detention, and to that end the Board of Children's Guardians and the Board of Education of the District of Columbia are authorized and empowered to arrange for the necessary teachers for said children."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in making that motion I am seeking information from the gentlemen who have charge of the bill as to whether this so-called detention home is to be really what the language implies—a home of temporary detention—or is it to be a place where children, either boys or girls, may be committed, either for a certain or an indeterminate period for instruction or correction?

I am thoroughly in accord, I will say to the gentleman, with the statement that if a temporary place of detention for children ought to be separate and apart from any other temporary place of detention, it should not be included, unless absolutely unavoidable, with any place of detention for male or female offenders against the law; that it should be a place, following the language of this bill, which would in fact be a temporary home of detention, because I believe that a home, even if it be a very poor home, and the influence of the parents, especially of the mother, are the very best things for the child. Therefore I have always opposed the incarceration of children for any length of time, even in a temporary home of detention, and, consequently, I want to know if it is to be a temporary home of detention, or whether it is the idea under this phraseology to incorporate a new place of correction, or a place where boys and girls may be sent for purposes of observation and correction?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the inquiry of the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD] I will say that the language in the substitute bill does not speak of it as a home, but merely as a place of temporary detention of children; that is, it is only intended to be a place for the temporary detention of children before they are committed to some permanent guardianship. But it was thought good public policy, if some child could not be put into permanent guardianship for perhaps 10 days or 2 weeks, that it should not be without instruction during that time, full discretion under the terms of the bill being given to the Board of Children's Guardians, who are to manage the home and say whether or not a child should have instruction during its temporary sojourn.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is there anything but a remote possibility that any child will be committed to this so-called temporary place of detention for a period of more than a day or two?

Mr. TINKHAM. I assume that in some cases, particularly of neglected children, or where there is a dispute in relation to the custody of children, it might well be that the court could not determine for perhaps a week or two as to what their permanent guardianship should be.

Where you have three or four thousand cases in a year you have a great variety, but I should assume that there well might be some cases where the child's guardianship could not be fixed within 48 hours, or perhaps even within one week.

Mr. GARD. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is it not in the language of this bill, and is it not very proper language, too, that this court has authority to allow the temporary custody of a child to be placed in the hands of a suitable person, be that person a man or a woman, or an institution or otherwise, for the temporary care and observation and correction of the child? And is not the object of the temporary place of detention merely to have a place where the child may be kept until it comes before the court, in order that the court may either place it with the parent or with some benevolent man or woman for its care, outside of some institution such as a temporary place of detention should be? And the bill having that object, is not the language incorporated—allowing the employment of teachers—unnecessary language?

I do not oppose this amendment as suggesting in any sense that they should not be afforded instruction, but is it not the purpose of the bill to make the stay of the child in the place of detention so limited in time that there could not be any fair opportunity afforded to the teacher to instruct him?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. TINKHAM. There is no intention that the temporary quarters shall be anything more than temporary, so far as the particular child is concerned, but it was thought that cases might arise where permanent guardianship could not be fixed within a very short time and where that was so it would be well for the child to be instructed while in temporary detention.

It seems to me that the use of the word "temporary" clearly governs the intent, and that there would be no misuse of the house for permanent occupancy, or for the maintenance of a school, because that would be contrary to the text and spirit of the enactment.

It does seem to me that it is sound policy to at least allow a child to receive instruction, although under temporary detention, if that detention be, as it well might be, continuous for more than two or three days.

Mr. GARD. If it is the policy of this law not to detain children more than temporarily, but to allow them to go to their homes or to be in care of other persons on the outside, what branch of instruction could possibly be given to any child, suppose it were kept in the place of detention say five days? What branch of instruction could be given to such child, and what teachers, experienced in what branches or grades, would you employ for that purpose?

Mr. TINKHAM. I assume there are kindergartens in the District of Columbia. If there were young children whose guardianships could not be fixed within 24 or 48 hours, and it was thought well they should be instructed in kindergarten work, then the bill, as it should, would allow it.

Mr. GARD. Surely the gentleman does not desire to convert a temporary place of detention into a kindergarten, or into a public school, or a private school. Understand me, I am in entire accord with what I think the gentleman is trying to do. I want to get a good juvenile court bill, and I want to afford all possible protection for all of the children that come into that court; but I would like information concerning this, because I think it is the best policy to get the children out of the temporary home of detention as soon as possible rather than to keep them there.

Mr. TINKHAM. In reply to the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD] I would say that the place is called a temporary place of detention for children. That means only a temporary place of detention, if it means anything. Therefore, in the spirit of the law and under its directory terms, it must be temporary.

There might arise cases where there was a dispute in relation to the custodial care of a child, and arrangements could not be made immediately for the appointment of a guardian. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, the Board of Children's Guardians should have a right, in their discretion, to have the child instructed while in the temporary place of detention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that his time may be extended two minutes in order to allow me to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman concluded his statement?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the gentleman is acquainted with the operation of juvenile courts in other cities?

Mr. TINKHAM. Somewhat.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman, from his knowledge, state to the House whether he knows of any single instance where in the operation of these courts instruction has been provided for those temporarily detained? I wish to say to the gentleman that I am personally acquainted with work of the juvenile court in the city of Milwaukee, which is a separate establishment, and has probation officers and matrons and the like, and is a very efficient organization; but it is not part of the work of that institution to give instruction to the temporarily detained children who happen to be there for a day or two. They are in the custody of the probation officer or of the matron.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What do they do?

Mr. STAFFORD. What do who do?

Mr. MANN. What do the children do, if they are detained there even one day? How is their time occupied?

Mr. STAFFORD. The children are brought to the separate building where the court is held, and the probation officer or the matron has them in charge and awaits the time when they are given a hearing.

Mr. MANN. I know; but what do the children do? It is impossible to keep a lot of children idle, unless they are thinking evil thoughts. What do they do?

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose they are instructed by the probation officer or the matron.

Mr. MANN. That is just it; if they are instructed. Instruction does not necessarily mean that they are to study Latin or Greek, or even mathematics.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Or parliamentary law.

Mr. MANN. Probably it would be more interesting to them to study parliamentary law, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], than to sit up with their backs against the wall doing nothing.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are occupied, but they are not given instruction by any regular teacher.

Mr. MANN. I was seeking information, because I did not know. I do not seem to be getting much information.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would be impracticable, because of their temporary detention, to instruct them in any lines of education.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no further desire for time.

Mr. MEEKER. I move to strike out the last word. I think the thought in the mind of the committee is correct. Some one should be provided in that detention home to occupy the minds of the children, and I think it would be well to designate that person as a teacher to do the very thing suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and that person or officer of the court so designated as a teacher, having charge of children from the ages of practically infancy up to 16 years of age, would not be expected to outline any particular course of study for 1 or 3 or 10 days; but such an official in that home is certainly as much needed as the matron or the caretaker. It seems to me that in line with all this proposed legislation we might as well or better designate this particular officer as a teacher than as a supervisor or anything of that sort and leave the matter of the teaching to the wisdom of the one holding the position, the same as we have seen fit to do in leaving the disposition of the cases and the control of the records in the hands of the judge who passes upon them.

Mr. GARD. Could not this matter of instruction, whether for an hour or two or for 10 days, be safely entrusted to the wisdom of the matron, the good woman who has the care of these boys and girls?

Is it not the object of the bill itself in the temporary detention home to provide that a woman of such qualifications be selected as the matron, that she may afford the children, whether 3, 5, 7, or 12 years of age, a proper instruction, whether it be hourly or daily or for a number of days? Does it not come down finally, after all, to the proper care of the child by the matron rather than by placing them under any course of study under a teacher, which could have no value?

Mr. MEEKER. I should say, in reply, that the two functions are entirely different. What the matron has to do is in the nature of being a mother to the children, while this would be in the nature of a nurse or caretaker.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the language of the bill does not compel instruction to be given. The language of the bill allows, if it is deemed best in the judgment of those having control of the house, to give the children instruction. As the honorable Representative from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, What are the children going to do? What can they better do than receive instruction? A permanent school could not be made out of a temporary place of detention without violating the law and the spirit of the law.

No teachers are compelled to be there. It is optional with the managers of the place, and where there are being handled three or four thousand children a year it would seem that this privilege, if it should be called a privilege rather than a necessity, should be given. We must assume that those in charge as public officers will act with judgment. To give them this authority, to have instruction if necessary, in cases which require it, would be a benefit, and they should not be deprived of this discretion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recognize the distinction in the character of work to be performed by the teacher assigned by the board of education, and the character of the caretaker that would give some attention to the temporary habitues? The regular qualified teacher would not be the character of person to give attention to the temporary inmates, but there should be some person like the matron or assistant matron who would know how to keep them occupied during the two or three days' stay, if it is that long. But this provision would delegate the power of education, the authority, to deputize a number of teachers to be on hand to meet some emergency case, and it seems to me that the gentleman ought to recognize the difference in the character of officials that would be needed for this kind of work.

Mr. TINKHAM. Let me say that there are now three matrons in the house of which we are speaking, and there will be a matron in the new house when it is established as a temporary detention house for children.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There are in the present house of detention three matrons employed, according to the gentleman's statement. There are on an average six children a day.

Mr. TINKHAM. Seven children a day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Seven children a day.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is a matron for every two children. If you carry out that proportion in the new temporary house of detention to have two matrons, and the average is only seven a day, you open the door, with the language which the gentleman from Ohio seeks to strike out, to an opportunity for the employment of a teacher for each child; and, in my judgment, the language ought to go out of the bill.

Mr. TINKHAM. In reply to that I want to say that in legislating we must assume that public officers will use authority with discretion. We have to assume, of course, that they will use what authority they have at least with some degree of common sense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I feel constrained to agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] that these words should be stricken from the bill. The language in the bill provides carte blanche for the employment of such teachers as the board may deem necessary. I have it from the judge of the juvenile court himself that the daily average of children in the house of detention is seven, and I also have it from the judge of the juvenile court that, in the main, they are brought there mornings and detained a few minutes, or, in other words, until court opens. So it does seem to me that that of itself would reduce very largely the attendance of children at this place, and I can not help but feel that the limitation should be placed upon the bill, instead of giving the court carte blanche for the employment of teachers. I therefore hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That the court, after a hearing, may place the child in the care and control of a probation officer, and may allow such child to remain in its home, subject to the visitation and control of the probation officer, to be returned to the court for further proceedings whenever such action may appear to the court to be necessary; or the court may authorize the child to be placed in a suitable family home, subject to the friendly supervision of the probation officer and the further order of the court; or it may authorize the child to be boarded out in some suitable family home in such manner as may be provided by law, or arrange by voluntary contribution or otherwise, until suitable provision may be made for the child in a home without such payment; or the court may commit the child to the Board of Children's Guardians, the National Training School for Boys, the National Training School for Girls, or to any institution, association, or corporation willing to receive it that may care for children within or without the District of Columbia; and the court, if satisfied that the child is in need of the care or discipline or protection of the court, may so adjudicate.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, however, That no such commitment shall be made to any institution, association, or corporation not subject to regular inspection by authority of law."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to take any time in explaining the amendment. It provides that where the court has taken jurisdiction of one of these children and it attempts to commit it to an institution, that it shall be such an institution as is subject to inspection under the law. In other words, that the child shall not be committed to any association, corporation, or institution that is not inspected by the lawful authorities of the District of Columbia. I do not think it is necessary to take any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think this would be a most unfortunate amendment. There are cases of children of all faiths coming to the juvenile court for disposition, and the effect of this proposed amendment would be to forbid the placing of a child in a Catholic institution or a Jewish institution, because such institutions are not inspected in accordance with law. One of the valuable provisions in this bill is that, so far as possible, the child shall be under the auspices of guardianship, so far as practicable, where the religious belief is the same as that of the parents of the child.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the gentleman will not think for a moment that I had anything sectarian in mind when I offered this amendment?

Mr. TINKHAM. But that is the effect of it, however.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman this question: In case the amendment is not adopted and children are committed to a private institution or one not subject to inspection under the law—not a public institution—is it anticipated that the particular institutions, associations, or corporations to which these children may be committed will come to Congress and ask for compensation for taking care of them.

Mr. TINKHAM. The Board of Children's Guardians, which board is closely associated in this bill with the juvenile court, does that to-day. Provisions are made from appropriations for the District of Columbia for the support of children where the child is not in the care of its natural parents and they could not pay for its support.

I will also say that in one of the sections toward the last part of the bill a yearly inspection is provided by the Board of Children's Guardians of all wards of this court, no matter where placed.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the wisdom of Congress making appropriations for private institutions and corporations of this character, when we have public institutions in the District which are supposed to take care of these children?

Mr. TINKHAM. There is no public institution in the District of Columbia to which wards of this kind can be committed.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then there ought to be one.

Mr. TINKHAM. We have not one now, and we are passing this bill with conditions as they stand to-day, not as they may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McKENZIE) there were—ayes 8, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, by inserting after the word "any," in line 18, the word "nonsectarian."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the Federal Government, the State government, or the municipal government ought to either directly or indirectly contribute to the support of any religious institution of any kind or character. I believe that all money paid into the Treasury by taxation should be expended in institutions not connected with any church of any character. I believe in keeping our governmental activities separate and apart from our religious persuasions and convictions. Under the present arrangement the selection of the institution has been left to the Board of Children's Guardians, and there is no specific authority granted in the statute to send them to these institutions. The law now, as I recollect it, is practically as the language is from line 16 down to the word "or" in line 18. I have not the statute before me, but we have this matter up before the District Appropriations Committee, and the Board of Children's Guardians have heretofore entered into contracts because they have the general control of the children, but there is no specific authority on the part of Congress directing them to put them into any institution save those as under the Government control. I believe this amendment ought to be adopted, because I do not believe Congress ought to commit itself even indirectly to the maintenance and support of any religion. Under the present arrangement, as has been stated here, we have no building sufficiently large to take care of all of the children committed to the Board of Children's Guardians, and we placed in the appropriation bill of last year an item which was defeated in the Senate on a motion in conference and was eliminated from the bill, authorizing the Government to build an institution of its own for the purpose of controlling its own wards; that is, in the District of Columbia. That ought to be done now, because I do not want any political issues in this country to ever be determined by a man's church connection, nor do I believe that religion ought, directly or indirectly, to be involved in any political campaign.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to have the gentleman explain the difference between paying a family of a particular religious belief for caring for a child and paying an institution of that same persuasion for taking care of a child.

Mr. SISSON. If the child is of Presbyterian or Methodist or Roman Catholic parentage, or whatever persuasion it may be, my understanding is that it has been the policy of the Board of Children's Guardians, wherever they could do so, to give the child a place in a family of the religious persuasions of its parents. That is the trouble when you do not have a governmental institution. We propose by this law to take a child even out of its own family and to take its liberty, to a certain extent, away from it, and we propose, then, to control the child, and he becomes the ward of the Government, and when you do that, when you assume that control of him, you ought to have a place where he can be taken care of by the same people that assume control of him, and we ought not to be dependent upon the various religious institutions to afford to Congress a place to put these unfortunate children. It has been a policy of our Government, from its very foundation down to this good hour, to keep our Government free from any contact with any religious institution.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I decline to yield at present.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want Congress to commit itself to the proposition of specifically giving the Board of Children's Guardians the right to commit children to any sectarian institution and pay the money out of the Federal Treasury for caring for them. Under the present arrangement it is absolutely essential that be done, because when the child is taken charge of by the juvenile court and the Government has no place to put it you then put the burden upon the Board of Children's Guardians, who become guardians by law of children, to provide the best means they can and have now to care for the children.

The result has been that many of these children have been of necessity sent to institutions under sectarian control. This ought not to occur; it ought to diminish; Congress ought to provide a suitable place, a suitable institution in which these children can be cared for, because I hope the time will never come when we shall have thrashed out on the floor of this House, on the floor of the State legislatures, or on the hustings men's religious faith and persuasions.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. For a question.

Mr. KONOP. The gentleman would like to have these children committed to a nonsectarian institution, an American institution, to a Government institution?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KONOP. Would the gentleman provide some religious instruction for these children in such an institution?

Mr. SISSON. I would not.

Mr. KONOP. The gentleman would just provide for their temporal welfare?

Mr. SISSON. I would provide for their temporal welfare. I do not believe the Federal Government ought to go into matters of religion at all.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that the Government ought to take a child away from the home of its mother, who may be very religious herself, at that age where most of us have learned some religion, and put that child in another home where religion can not be taught at all, in spite of the protests of the mother whose first thought and desire may be to have the child taught something about religion?

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection on earth to the child which is taken charge of by the Government attending the religious services under the church of the mother or the father. I have no thought of objection to that, but I do have an objection to the Federal Government going into this business of having the churches engaging in a scramble about who will get control of the children. If you give me control of the children for a few years, it will not be long, then, until I can control the Government, because you give me control of the children and I will control the Government. I want this Government to remain out of religion entirely. I am willing for the spirit of Christianity and the right sort of religion to fill the hearts and minds of men, and let them, if they desire to do so, imitate the example of the great Nazarene in the purity and thought of His life, but that has nothing to do with government. That is a matter of a man's own conscience, a matter of his own mind. I am unwilling that any persuasion should take direct control or indirect control of any money that may be collected from the people of this country by taxation, either of the Federal Government or of the State government. I know that I may be a little bit chary about precedents; it may be that I am too careful about precedents, but I do know the weakness of precedents. I do know how far you may go from the true pathway by citing a bad precedent as an excuse for present conduct, and I am unwilling to agree, without raising my voice in protest, to a proposition going in this bill enlarging the power of the Board of Children's Guardians by specific enactment of authorization, by a direct vote of Congress, to patronize certain religious institutions with these children. If you will strike out all the words that have been placed in the law, and leave the matter in the hands of the Board of Guardians, it then will leave them to do perhaps as they are now doing, and I trust that the time will come when, with the gentleman from Illinois, we will have an institution of our own to care for our own children.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That during the probationary period of any child and during the time that said child may be committed to any institution, or to the care of the Board of Children's Guardians, or to any other association or person for custodial or disciplinary purposes, said child shall, if it should appear to the court that the welfare of said child will be conserved thereby, be subject to the friendly visitation of the probation officer or other agent of the court; and any order or judgment, interlocutory or final, made by the court in the case of any such child shall be subject to such modification from time to time as the court may consider to be for the welfare of such child; and no commitment of any child to the Board of Children's Guardians, or to any institution or other custodial agency, shall deprive the court of the jurisdiction to change the form of the commitment or transfer the custody of said child to some other institution or agency on such conditions as the court may see fit to impose, the duty being constant upon the court to give to all children subject to its jurisdiction such oversight and control in the premises as will conduce to the welfare of said children and the best interests of the District. No order transferring the custody of a child shall be made except after a full hearing and upon not less than 10 days' written notice to the guardian, institution, or agency to whose care such child has theretofore been committed, unless such guardian, institution, or agency consents thereto. An appeal may be taken both upon the law and upon the facts from any order of the court transferring the custody of a child from one guardian, institution, or agency to another guardian, institution, or agency aggrieved by such order, in the same manner as other appeals provided herein. The court shall have no power, however, to transfer the custody of any child embraced herein after such child may have been adopted as provided by law, except at a subsequent hearing and upon a petition filed as herein provided in a new proceeding involving such child. The provisions of this section shall not apply to children committed to the National Training School for Boys and National Training School for Girls.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, in line 19, the spelling of the word "custody" will be corrected, and also at the end of line 18 insert a period.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman in reference to the last provision of the paragraph:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to children committed to the National Training School for Boys or the National Training School for Girls.

Mr. TINKHAM. As I understand it, the National Training School for Boys and the National Training School for Girls are for the commitment of boys and girls from the various Federal courts from all of the States. Commitments are made only where the child is to stay until it is 21 years old. In other words, there is a rule in these institutions concerning commitment, it being that none shall be committed except those whose commitments are not to terminate before they are 21 years old, and therefore it was thought that an exception for these schools should be made.

Mr. GARD. Well, section 20 provides for the commitment by the court to the National Training School for Boys and the National Training School for Girls; and then follows the succeeding section—section 21—providing, in effect, that the judge retains the custody of the child for the child's own good, and he may change the custody of it; and provides that the benefit of this section 21—and it seems to me they are very reasonable benefits for the children—are not to be availed of by children committed by this particular court to the National Training School for Boys or the National Training School for Girls.

Mr. TINKHAM. Now, the answer to that, I think, is this: That the committee thought that as much latitude as possible should be given to the judge in relation to the change of custodial care of the child; that he should be given power to commit to any institution of whatsoever character the child who he thought best fitted for a particular institution or surroundings, or the necessities of the case required, and therefore it seemed unsound not to allow him to commit a child to one of these national schools. It is thought that if the court believed a child should be committed to one of these national schools, that as the general Federal law was that any child committed must stay until he was 21 years old, that an exception should be made in changing guardianship, as it would be bad policy to make two difference classes in these national institutions, one class of delinquents from the District of Columbia and one class coming from all the States of the Union. The mere fact that the court would not have authority to take a child out from either of these schools after it was once committed would make it obligatory upon him to send only those cases to these institutions where, manifestly or plainly, the child should be in custody until it was 21 years old. Besides, this exception is a recommendation of the Attorney General himself in his report upon this bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last paragraph in this section, beginning in line 8 on page 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, strike out all of line 8, after the word "child," down to and including the word "Girls," in line 14.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the object of making this motion to strike out is that it seems to me the language embodied in section 21 is proper language for the care of the child. The entire, and, indeed, the only proper object of a juvenile court law is the care and proper control of the child. It is not a matter of visiting punishment upon a child, but it is a matter of affording it care, of giving it proper environment. And environment, we all know, is of the very highest benefit in the bringing up of a child. So that when this section provides, as I think it properly does, that the court shall retain the continuous jurisdiction over all children whom it commits, and may have the power to change that commitment, to change the place of commitment, change the personnel of commitment, always bearing in mind the benefit to the child, I think the language limiting the provisions to children other than those which the court has committed to the National Training School for Boys or the National Training School for Girls is not proper language.

The gentleman says the Attorney General has said something in a report about this particular language, but I am sure they confuse the Attorney General's report with the issue here to-day. This law can only apply, as I view it, to children committed by the judge of the juvenile court for the District of Columbia. He may, under section 20 of this act, commit a boy to the National Training School for Boys. It certainly may be easily imagined to be a proper case that a boy, having been committed to this training school for boys, and having been there for five months or six months, conditions might arise which would make it necessary, or at least better, for the welfare of the boy that he be taken from that National Training School for Boys and placed somewhere else. Under this law you can not do that. You can not take him out of the National Training School for Boys and put him in a private home.

I confess that I approach this matter with considerable experience, and that experience is that a home—I do not necessarily call it a good home, but a private home, a place where a boy has individual care—is better than an ordinary institution. And therefore I have always thought wherever it was possible to keep children out of public institutions that should be the policy of the law. And in this case, conceding it was necessary for us to send him, for his best interest, to this National Training School for Boys, suppose his conduct shows that he has entirely reformed; suppose that his best interests, the making of a future American citizen's best interests, demand that he be taken from this boys' training school and put with some good man and good woman who will bring him up properly, send him to school and give him a proper home rearing; certainly that would be, in contemplation of this juvenile-court law, a very proper thing. And I submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this language ought to be eliminated, so as to permit boys who have been sent there under proper cases to be taken out under the same authority which committed them and to be placed in a position or an institution or a home for their own separate, individual betterment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARD. My time has expired, but I will ask unanimous consent for an extension of one minute, so that I may answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Referring to your view that it would be better to have it in a private home, if possible, is it not true that one of the chief activities of some of the States in the matter of public institutions for this purpose is to find private homes to which to send these children? Is not that one of the chief activities?

Mr. GARD. That is true; and I think that is one of the most laudable activities that the so-called social service may be engaged in—the taking of boys and girls from institutions and putting them in good Christian homes.

Mr. FESS. I agree with you.

Mr. GARD. And I think the language ought to be stricken out, so as to permit the very thing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has so well called my attention to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That whenever it shall appear to the court, in the case of any child in need of more suitable guardianship which has been taken from its home or the custody of its parents, that conditions have so changed that it is consistent with the public good and the welfare of said child that the parents again have the custody of said child, the court, subject to the provisions of this act, may make a suitable order in the premises.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, moving to strike out the last word in section 24, may I ask what beneficial result follows from the language in lines 21 and 22, providing that the parents of the children may again have the custody of the child, subject to the provisions of this act? Is it intended by that to retain the jurisdiction of the court even after the custody is again given to the child's parents? If that be true, I have no objection. I did not know what the intention was.

Mr. TINKHAM. I think that is the intention.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 32. That the Board of Children's Guardians shall act as an advisory board to the judge of the juvenile court, and in addition to their other duties provided by law they shall perform the following duties:

(a) To visit as often as twice a year all institutions, societies, or associations receiving children under this act. Such visits shall be made by not less than three of the members of said board, who shall go together and make a report, and said board shall report to the juvenile court from time to time the condition of the children received by or in charge of any persons, institutions, or associations, and shall make an annual report to the judge of the juvenile court.

(b) To advise and cooperate with the judge of the juvenile court upon all matters affecting the workings of this act and to recommend to the court any and all needful measures for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

(c) From time to time, and as often as may be necessary, to hold examinations for the selection of officials to be appointed under this act, and in the performance of any duties said board may promulgate any rules and regulations not in conflict with this act.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, moving to strike out the last word, I beg to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill why this so-called juvenile court bill carries in it language interpreting the duties of the Board of Children's Guardians as to what they shall do, and different things which do not seem, unless I can have some satisfactory explanation, to have any reasonable connection with the juvenile court?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in explanation I want to say that the Board of Children's Guardians has at present a close contact with the present juvenile court, but the proposed bill makes that contact much closer and well knit. It was thought good policy that they should be so. The Board of Children's Guardians is a board of public guardians to whom children are committed. By whom? By the court.

Mr. GARD. How many are there?

Mr. TINKHAM. There are nine members of the Board of Children's Guardians. They are, in effect, public guardians to whom the court may commit a ward, or the court may commit the child to a private guardian. In other words, there are two classes of guardians to whom the court may commit a child: First, private guardians, which would be individuals or private institutions; and second, public guardians, who are the Board of Children's Guardians, consisting of nine members, as I stated, who are appointed from among the residents of the District of Columbia. Therefore, they being the public guardians of the community—that is, this Board of Children's Guardians—their relationship to the juvenile court is not only clear and plain, but should be made as close as possible.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that their positions are purely honorary and not remunerative?

Mr. TINKHAM. Entirely so.

Mr. GARD. They are appointed by the commissioners, or by whom?

Mr. TINKHAM. There is a provision in this bill which will be reached later, which provides that the board shall be appointed by the judge of the juvenile court. To-day the board is appointed by the judge of the police court of the district and the judge of the supreme court, sitting in the criminal session.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield to me again?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Bearing in mind the fact that the juvenile court bill creates not only a judge, but probation officers and female commissioners and clerks and other officers of inspection and correction, does it not seem to the gentleman having charge of the bill that there might possibly come about some conflict of authority between the appointment by the court of his probation officers and this Board of Children's Guardians? And is not this language in paragraph (a) of this section 32, and paragraphs (b) and (c), illustrative and explanatory rather of the duties of the Board of Children's Guardians than anything in relation to the juvenile court? But chiefly my inquiry goes to the gentleman who has charge of the bill—he and I are trying to perfect it in such way as we can—if it may not be true that there might be at some time a very serious conflict of authority between the probation officers appointed by the court and this Board of Children's Guardians appointed by the court? And if the law is to be amended as the gentleman says, and it shall provide that the Board of Children's Guardians is to be appointed by the juvenile court, and is to have the same jurisdiction practically and the same advisory capacity as the probation officers, why appoint the Board of Children's Guardians at all?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that all the suggestions made by the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD] are made in a spirit of amity and friendliness to the bill, and not in a spirit of hostility.

Answering his first question, I want to say that there is not a new office created under this bill or under the terms of it. The bill and its language limit absolutely the juvenile court and its offices to the juvenile court as at present constituted. The bill creates no new offices. It creates no new expenditures, and it provides no opportunity for further expenditures, without the approval of the Committee on Appropriations. That is the answer to the honorable Representative's first question.

Now, the honorable Representative speaks of the possibility of a conflict between the Board of Children's Guardians and the probation officers. To-day there are the same probation officers that we shall have under the proposed bill. There is no conflict to-day, and why assume there will be to-morrow?

Again let me say to the honorable Representative that the possibility of a conflict in the future, although it has never arisen in the past, was foreseen, and therefore it is provided in the bill, as the honorable Representative will see in a subsequent section, that the Board of Childrens' Guardians shall be appointed by the judge of the juvenile court. To-day, as I have said, they are appointed by the police judge and a judge of the supreme court sitting in criminal sessions, so that there is no fundamental change in having them appointed by the juvenile judge. They are the public guardians, and it is entirely proper that they should be appointed by the judge of the juvenile court, just as the juvenile court appoints the private guardians.

The bill has been very carefully studied. The coordination of the various bodies has been taken into consideration and the committee hopes that all the possibilities of friction have been carefully foreseen and provided against by the construction of the bill, as will be made evident to the honorable Representative as we proceed further into its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 33. That the jury for service in the court shall consist of 12 men, who shall have the legal qualifications necessary for jurors in the Supreme Court of the District, and shall receive a like compensation for their services, and such jurors shall be drawn under and in pursuance of the laws concerning the drawing of jurors for service in said supreme court. The term of service of jurors shall be for three months, and, in any case on trial, at the expiration of such time, until a verdict shall have been rendered or the jury discharged. The jury terms shall begin on the first Tuesdays in January, April, July, and October of each year, and shall terminate, subject to the foregoing provisions, upon the Monday immediately preceding the beginning of the following term. When it shall happen that in a pending trial no verdict is found, nor the jury otherwise discharged before the next succeeding jury term, the court shall proceed with the trial by the same jury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we considering the bill by sections or by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. By sections. The Clerk will complete the readings of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

At least 10 days before the term of service of jurors shall begin, not less than 26 names shall be drawn and certified by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District to the juvenile court for service during the then ensuing jury term. Deficiencies in any panel may be filled according to the law applicable to jurors in said juvenile court shall possess the powers of a justice of said supreme court. The United States marshall for said District, by himself or deputy, shall have charge of said jury under the direction of the juvenile court.

The CHAIRMAN. The word "marshal," in line 14, page 22, is misspelled, and if there be no objection it will be corrected.

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill if these juveniles are to have a jury trial in this court?

Mr. TINKHAM. They are not to have a jury trial, but adults contributing to their delinquency may be charged with a misdemeanor or crime under the terms of the previous section, however dependent upon the character of the acts contributing to the delinquency. If the adult is charged with a crime, he must, of course, be tried by a jury.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman tell me what section that is?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Section 31.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts mean section 31?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Then I will ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be better to have such causes transferred to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, rather than to encumber the juvenile court with the machinery whereby a jury trial may be had? Why would it not facilitate the investigation and punishment of such offenders to have their cases transferred to a court having jurisdiction of that sort of cases, rather than to mix the jurisdiction of the juvenile court by trying adults, even though juvenile offenders may be involved in the same offense?

Mr. TINKHAM. In answer to the question of the honorable Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] I would say that all juvenile courts, so far as I know, in the several States take jurisdiction of an adult who has contributed to the delinquency of a child or who has abandoned a child. I believe that is true in the Massachusetts law, in the Kentucky law, in the Illinois law, in the California law, in the Washington law, and in the Ohio law. I believe it is so in these States.

The reason is that the juvenile court has jurisdiction of the child, and its position of guardian of the child is such that it desires and should have superior knowledge and care in relation to the child, more interest in the child than that of another court, and it should have the authority to punish offenses committed, not so much against the common weal as against the child. That is the theory in the contemplation of the modern juvenile law.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman tell me how many jury trials have been held by the juvenile court in the city of Boston, in his own State?

Mr. TINKHAM. Here is a report issued three days ago in Massachusetts in relation to this phase of the juvenile law. The Massachusetts law is that the court may proceed against the adult who has contributed to the delinquency, and the adult after conviction by the court may appeal to the superior court. Now the result of that system has led, upon investigation, to the finding of these facts, reported only three days ago to the Massachusetts Legislature——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINKHAM. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. This report of the commission in Massachusetts says:

In Boston, or so much of the city as is covered by the jurisdiction of the Boston municipal court, proceedings against parents have had to be brought into that court.

This is the new section reported by the committee—provides that the Boston Juvenile Court shall have jurisdiction concurrent with the municipal court in the complaints against parents.

Another defect in the law as it has been used is in dealing with appeals to the superior court in juvenile cases.

Then it speaks further of the congestion and the impossibility of having these cases speedily disposed of in another court.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do.

Mr. MAPES. I notice here, in the last sentence of the first paragraph of the section, it provides that in case of a disagreement by the jury the court shall proceed with the trial by the same jury immediately. Is not that an unusual provision?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not explain that provision.

Mr. MAPES. If it is agreeable to the gentleman, I will move to strike out that paragraph.

Mr. TINKHAM. I see no reason for that provision, and shall not object if it is stricken out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield a moment before he makes his motion?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MAPES. I move that the sentence beginning with line 3, after the word "term" and beginning with the word "when," be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 3, after the word "term," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I should like recognition if the gentleman from Michigan does not wish to proceed further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the motion is made under a misapprehension. I think the provision is quite proper, if the provision in reference to juries shall be here at all. I think this court should be able to get along without a jury.

Mr. TINKHAM. The juvenile court tries nonsupport cases and bastardy cases, and they both require jury trials, and both of these cases are proper cases for the juvenile court.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand all that; but I do not think there will be enough to need a jury. The matter of trying these cases might be arranged by providing for an appeal, as is done in the Massachusetts courts. But this particular paragraph, or this portion of it, is expected to cover and intended to provide for a case where the jury trial is proceeding up to the end of the term when the jury ought to be discharged and the case is not finished. The jury, under the law, without a provision of this kind, would have no authority to exist. Under this provision, notwithstanding the term for which the jurors were drawn is not finished, the court can go on and proceed with the trial with the same jury.

Mr. GARD. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the language of line 3, page 22:

When it shall happen that in a pending trial no verdict is found, nor the jury otherwise discharged before the next succeeding jury term, the court shall proceed with the trial by the same jury.

That language is sufficient to cover the case, where the case has been started by a jury and the term of the jurors expire, but would it not be incomprehensible that a particular case, after a disagreement, should again be tried by the same jury?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think the gentleman properly understands the force of the language to which he refers. I think that is intended to cover the case where the jury has not rendered a verdict up to the time when the term closes.

Mr. MAPES. Would not the language on page 21, lines 22, 23, and 24, provide for the contingency which the gentleman from Iowa has in mind, when it says:

The term of service of jurors shall be for three months, and, in any case on trial, at the expiration of such time, until a verdict shall have been rendered or the jury discharged—and is not this language entirely superfluous to cover the point which the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In view of that provision which I had not noticed, it may sufficiently cover it, but this is the point that the provision was intended to cover.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. The amendment of the gentleman is to strike out lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, page 22, and I offer this as a substitute to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, amend by striking out all after the word "when," line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "When no verdict is found in a pending trial at the close of the term the cause may be continued before the same jury during the succeeding term."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, was not the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can give unanimous consent to withdraw the whole amendment and then the gentleman from Missouri can offer his amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I will reoffer the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri offered the amendment to perfect the text, and that amendment has been agreed to. The text has been perfected. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri was not an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 12, after the word "said," insert the words "supreme court, and for this purpose the judge of the."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will let the gentleman in charge of the bill look at it and see whether it ought to go in. The bill says:

Deficiencies in any panel may be filled according to the law applicable to jurors in said juvenile court shall possess the powers of a justice of said supreme court.

I do not suppose they intend to give jurors the powers of a justice of the supreme court.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, that evidently is a mistake. The bill was not printed until this morning. The committee has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 15, after the word "act," in line 14, strike out all of the section and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 33. That all cases involving commissions of offenses by adults or by adult and juvenile offenders jointly, shall be transferred to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for prosecution and trial of the adult."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think, as I before stated, that we should not confer upon this new court the right to impanel juries for the trial of offenses committed by adults or by adults and juvenile offenders jointly; that that authority and power may well be vested in this court after it has once been established and had an opportunity to act upon a proper working basis under the terms of the act, and I think it would be much better and more efficient work would be done under the law if we let this court treat with children solely and provide that if offenses come before it involving the punishment of adult offenders those cases shall be transferred to the supreme court or to the grand jury, as the authority has been given in a previous section of the act. I think this court should be kept solely and purely a juvenile court.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, if we do that we reverse the present policy of the juvenile-court law in the District of Columbia, a policy which also maintains in almost every State of the Union. We would take away a power that the present juvenile court has in the District of Columbia. One of the reasons in the report of the Attorney General for a change of the juvenile-court law of the District of Columbia is that under the present law—the law of 1906—the technicalities are such that, although power is given to the court to proceed against the adult who is a contributor to the delinquency of the child, the law can not be enforced. So that if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is accepted it will be contrary to the entire juvenile-court laws of the States, as I understand it, and the present law of the District of Columbia. It will reverse the policy of Congress in relation to the juvenile-court law now maintaining in the District of Columbia and will be contrary to one of the recommendations of the Attorney General.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that if this provision is left in and trial is had in this court by a jury of an offense committed by an adult and a juvenile jointly the provisions of section 16 of the act would apply, where it says that no adjudication upon the status of any child under the provisions of the act shall operate as a disqualification for jury duty or for any other public service, and so forth?

Mr. TINKHAM. I think that has no application.

Mr. WALSH. There is no exception made in the section. If tried with an adult offender for the commission of an offense committed jointly, there is no exception made in section 16, and the gentleman says that, although they be tried and found guilty and sentenced, that after that that record would not be a conviction, and there is a reason why that sort of cases ought to go to a court having jurisdiction of criminal offenses.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in reply let me say, again, that it would be contrary to the course of juvenile procedure in all the States and contrary to the course of this Congress and the policy of the Congress. I now have found the words in the report of the Attorney General which says that the law now is to hold the adult who is contributory to the deliquency to the jurisdiction of the juvenile court.

In the supplement to the annual report of the Attorney General he says, in speaking of the bill now before us, that the contributory delinquent sections of the law—of 1906—are so defectively drawn as to prevent proceedings in cases in which adults are really responsible, and that during the past 18 months, the period of the present judge, not a single case of the kind has been prosecuted in the court. He further states that the foregoing legislation, referring to the present law of 1906, is strikingly out of harmony with the modern movement touching juvenile-court legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman answer the question which I propounded some time ago? How many jury trials have been held in the juvenile court of the city of Boston, a part of which is in the gentleman's district?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not answer that question.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a sufficient reply to the contention of the Attorney General of the United States that the judge, exercising the discretion given him by this bill, can transfer the case to a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. TINKHAM. He can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the attitude expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is an attitude entirely in opposition to the real purposes of this so-called juvenile-court act. The purpose of the act is that a court called a juvenile court will deal with persons of immature age; therefore the court does not approach the matter in the sternness and possibly not in the sense of accuracy with which one may deal with adult men and women; that it is a matter of protection, and therefore the very strength of any juvenile-court act is in incorporating in that act the power to punish anyone who promotes, produces, or contributes to any delinquency. That is, any man who, operating as a fence here in the city of Washington—and I assume that such may be—who openly solicits or encourages boys to sell iron or brass from railroad cars—I make this as an illustration only—is contributing to the delinquency of that boy. That boy may be of the age of 6, 7, or 8, and entirely immature with respect to any moral or legal obligation to the society in which he lives. The man who promotes such delinquency as a rule is a man without responsibility, and therefore it is most highly desirable in this connection in a juvenile court to carry with it the power of plenary punishment of the man who contributes to the delinquency or the wrongdoing of the child, and when you take that away from the juvenile-court act you have merely a sort of corrective institution, an advisory institution for the child. So, if this act is to be any good, if it is to have any force here in the District of Columbia, it must carry with it the power of punishing those who offend by promoting the delinquency of the child. However, I desire to make an inquiry of the gentlemen who are proponents and in active charge of the bill about a matter where, it seems to me, it needs correcting.

I am unable to say from a reading of the bill just to whom this privilege of having a trial by jury apply. I do not know whether it is the policy of the gentleman to include this case in the reasoning he presents. Suppose a boy of the age of 16 years is charged with the killing of another boy, say, of 17 years. He would be classed in ordinary legal procedure as being charged with a homicide. Because of the fact he is under the age of 17 years, if this proposed act be passed in the District of Columbia, it would be necessary for the arresting officer or the person having him in charge to send him to the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia. He is there required to face the charge of homicide. Is it the policy of this juvenile court, when such a state of affairs is presented in it, to send that boy back to the supreme court for trial before a jury or is it the policy to try him before the juvenile court, where he might rightfully be tried, and when this part relating to the presence of the jury is in this bill, then I assume that this juvenile court is clothed with full and complete power to hear and determine the case which may come before it. Now, it is said that this is intended to apply only to those cases where men or women are charged with promoting, inducing, or contributing to delinquency or to the commission of crimes or misdemeanors by youthful persons. I am sure that is a very splendid provision in the bill and a very necessary one, but I desire in that connection to call the attention of the gentleman to this provision, that I think somewhere in this bill there should be a provision as to when these persons are entitled to a trial by jury, and reading section 33 would lead one to believe that there is no restriction upon trial by jury. I myself think there should be a restriction upon the trial by jury, and I think, adopting the language or the impression of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that a great majority, in fact ninety-nine out of every one hundred cases—I go so far as to make it a larger proportion of cases—should be tried by the juvenile court without the intervention of a jury; but I can see where a fence or a junk dealer is charged here with promoting a boy of 7 years of age to steal brass from a railroad car or to steal switch lights or something of that kind which might result in a serious loss of lives, that such a person is entitled to a trial by a jury, and there should be language in this bill somewhere saying when and at what time that man can have a jury trial, whether the law gives it to him whether he deserves it or not, or whether it is to be given to him on demand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. It seems to me that this a very material part of the bill we are approaching right here, the question of when these children—and I use the word "children" because that is the object of the bill—when they are to be tried by juries and when adult persons are to be tried by juries.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand the gentleman to say that he thought under this bill the children were to be tried by jury in any case?

Mr. GARD. I assume, under the language of this bill, unless it is otherwise explained to me—under the language of this section 33—they would be tried by jury.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course the gentleman understands that trial by jury is not required in such cases by any constitutional provision, or anything of that kind?

Mr. GARD. I am trying to find from the language of the bill whether it is required or not. That is the reason why I am asking the question of the gentlemen who have active charge of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems the early paragraphs of the bill provided what is to be done where the child alone is tried.

Mr. GARD. At no place in the bill, as I now see, is there any accurate description as to whom the trial by jury shall be allowed. I therefore ask to be informed of this by the gentlemen of the committee.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. MANN. In view of the constitutional provision that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on the presentment or indictment by a grand jury, is there any occasion for our discussing here how a juvenile court shall act in the case of a person accused of murder under the terms of this bill?

Mr. TINKHAM. That is a manifest answer to the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. If no one is charged with a crime, no jury is required. If an adult is charged with a crime, the Constitution requires a jury trial.

With what the Constitution requires and with what practice universally demands it is unnecessary to cumber up such a bill as this.

Now, so far as the various questions raised by the honorable Representative from Ohio [Mr. GARD] are concerned, I will state for his enlightenment the full facts—that there is a provision made in the beginning of the bill that if a child is brought before the court and the court thinks best, because the act committed is a serious crime, a heinous crime, involving high moral turpitude, that child may be immediately certified to the proper authorities for prosecution in the usual way. That power is given to the juvenile judge to exercise in an exceptional case, for instance, such a case as homicide, perhaps in the first degree.

Now, what is a jury provided for in the juvenile court? First, for the purpose of trying an adult who is charged with a crime contributing to the delinquency of a child. If he is charged with this crime, he must be tried by a jury. The juvenile court has jurisdiction of bastardy cases and also cases of nonsupport, both of which require jury trials.

So it will be seen that there is patent necessity for the juvenile court to have a jury to operate in cases of these various characters.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any provision in the bill or otherwise for the adult accused to waive the right to a jury trial and submit his case entirely to the judge in those cases other than those involving capital offense or misdemeanor?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not remember that there is any power for an adult so accused to waive the right of a jury trial.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Should there not be such a provision?

Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to assure the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] that my amendment is not prompted by any opposition in this bill. I am heartily in favor of this bill becoming a law, because I know how well the juvenile court has worked in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and in the city from which I come. It is an admirable system and works well and gives a great deal of protection to the juvenile of the communities. But my purpose was not to put upon this court the machinery of a trial by jury to try adult offenders, but to send them to the court having jurisdiction of them; and the gentleman's objection that this court ought to have authority to punish adults who instigate children to commit crime, it seems to me, is not well founded, because this court could refer them to a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does the honorable Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] understand that under the present law, both in bastardy cases and in nonsupport cases, juries are required in the juvenile court?

Mr. WALSH. That may be true, Mr. Chairman, but as I understood the gentleman in his opening remarks upon this bill, it was to seek now to divest the juvenile court of its criminal atmosphere, so to speak. If that is the purpose of this bill, I submit that the provisions of section 33 are in direct conflict with the provisions of section 16, because if you have a trial of a juvenile and an adult by a jury in this court, and they are both found guilty, the provision in section 16 is to the effect that as to the juvenile it shall not be a conviction, and I submit that that is an absurd provision to write into the law. The safer way to do would be to take a jury trial away from this court, and in all cases where there is reason for a jury trial to provide that the judge of the juvenile court should transfer those cases to the supreme court, which has authority to grant jury trials, and which is holding jury trials throughout each and every term for criminal offenders.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a further amendment. On page 22, following the word "court," at the end of section 33, insert the following:

Any person who has knowingly or willfully encouraged, aided, caused, abetted, or connived at, or has knowingly or willfully done any act or acts to produce, promote, or contribute to the conditions that bring said child within the provisions of this act, arrested or cited to appear before such court at any time before hearing, may demand a trial by jury, or the judge, upon his own motion, may call a jury.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that gentlemen will want to discuss that amendment, and it is not in very good shape as yet to present to the committee. It is perfectly evident also that it will not be possible to finish the bill to-night. I had hoped that we would be able to finish the bill to-night, but it is evident that with that amendment pending we can not do so. We have reached the ordinary adjourning time, and I think it is time to rise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8348) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia," and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FRAUDULENT ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there is on the Speaker's table a bill (H. R. 10490) to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia. It has passed the Senate and has come back here with some amendments. I ask that the amendments be disagreed to and that a committee of conference be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10490) to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill just reported, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. VINSON, and Mr. CARY.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GRIEST, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, for what purpose?

Mr. KITCHIN. The legislative bill will require about an hour to get through, and I would like to have the House utilize that hour and then get started with the sugar bill.

Mr. MANN. It is quite certain that the legislative bill will take more than an hour to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman in charge of the bill thinks it will not take more than an hour.

Mr. MANN. The legislative bill has a matter still pending which is of very great interest to a great many people in and out of the House. The parliamentary status of it is not yet determined, and if we do not take more than an hour on that I will be much surprised.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point of order is not good, but I supposed it will be discussed.

Mr. GARNER. It has already been discussed a good deal.

Mr. MANN. It has not been discussed at all, and any parliamentarian who passes upon it so lightly has not examined it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then it is all the more important that we meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I am trying to show the gentleman that we can not get through with the sugar bill to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will take up the sugar bill immediately on the close of the legislative bill.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of meeting at 11 o'clock to-morrow when it is not possible to get through with the legislative bill in an hour? If the legislative bill was out of the way and it was possible to finish the sugar bill to-morrow without unduly restricting the time, I would not object.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] might simplify the matter by withdrawing his amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. And the gentleman might simplify it by withdrawing the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is a deficiency bill to come up on Thursday, and my thought was that if we could take an hour on the legislative bill to-morrow, or two hours, and then come in with the sugar bill, and possibly carry it over two hours on Thursday, depending upon the length of debate that gentlemen want, and then if we get through the sugar bill, the deficiency bill could be taken up and finished.

Mr. MANN. If we get through both by Thursday night we will be doing well, but there is no object in meeting at 11 o'clock until we get where we are going into real business. It disconcerts everybody.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, if the gentleman does not want to work the extra hour I will withdraw the request, but I thought he was a working man.

Mr. MANN. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion that I ought to have the hour between 11 and 12 o'clock every day for rest, and I object. [Laughter.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 14, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11304) for the relief of Martha A. Moffitt, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 327), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8622) for the relief of the estate of B. F. Havens, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 328), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12553) for the relief of the estate of Gilbert Winne, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 329), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7417) for the relief of Lawrence J. Kessinger, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 330), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DIES, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1592) for the relief of George W. Trahey, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 331), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10642) for the relief of Louis Jones, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 332), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1609) for the relief of S. L. Burgard, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 333), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1916.

Bishop E. D. Mouzon, D. D., of Dallas, Tex., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob, God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, God of our fathers, Thou art our God also. We believe in Thee. We believe that as Thou wast with the men of old time, as Thou hast been with our fathers, so Thou art with us to-day. Enlighten, we beseech Thee, the blindness of our minds with the knowledge of Thy truth that in Thy light we may see light. And so do Thou give us guidance in all things, that all that is done may be begun and continued and ended in God. We ask these things in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Saturday, March 11, 1916, was read and approved.

CHRISTIAN CHRISTENSEN V. THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 356).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the cause of Christian Christensen v. The United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate relative to the acceptance of the statue of Henry Mower Rice, presented by the State of Minnesota, to be placed in Statuary Hall.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10490) to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. VINSON, and Mr. CARY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 65) creating a joint commission of Congress, to be known as the Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Hawaiian Society, Sons of the American Revolution, and a petition of the Vermont Society, Sons of the American Revolution, praying for an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Post No. 68, Grand Army of the Republic, of Dorchester, Mass., praying for the creation of a volunteer officers' retired list, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Everyman Bible Class of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, of Washington, D. C., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Congregational Church of Elgin, Ill., praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia without the referendum, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry labor unions in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Ira Stowell Camp, United Spanish War Veterans, of Newport, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 132, United Garment Workers of America, of Keene, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. NORRIS. I present a memorial of sundry citizens of Silver Creek, Nebr., protesting against the preparedness program. In this connection I ask that the affidavit attached to the memorial may be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the accompanying affidavit was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Charles Wooster, whose name appears first on the above petition on "preparedness," being first duly sworn, deposes and says that all of the signatures to the said petition are genuine and made under his own eye; that he made no effort to sort people out or to influence them to sign; that with perhaps three or four exceptions those signing already had their minds made up on the question of preparedness; that whereas 100 signed only 11 declined to sign, or a little less than 10 per cent; and that he regards the above as fair a test of public opinion in the matter of things covered in the petition as it would be possible to obtain.

CHARLES WOOSTER.

STATE OF NEBRASKA,
County of Merrick, ss:

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 24th day of February, 1916.
[SEAL.] J. W. JACKMAN, Notary Public.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, of Chicago, Ill., and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TARIFF.

There has been a growing conviction on the part of the American public that the tariff should be taken out of politics, and that the only way in which this can be accomplished is by the establishment of a permanent tariff commission. The mere creation of such a commission is looked upon as a complete and permanent solution of an extremely vexatious political question, in spite of the fact that under the broadest powers it is proposed to give to this body it will serve only as a bureau for the collection and analysis of facts pertaining to the conditions under which domestic and competing foreign industries manufacture and sell goods.

There is danger, should this conviction continue to prevail, that two considerations of vital and immediate importance will be lost sight of.

First. That the tariff must and will remain a political issue until this country has definitely and finally chosen between a tariff for the protection of American industries and a tariff for revenue only; and Second. That the present tariff schedule, judged by its effect on American industry before the war began, will be entirely inadequate to meet the extraordinary conditions which will obtain after the war closes.

How will the creation of a tariff commission, with its necessarily slow and painstaking investigations both at home and abroad, help in the solution of the problems which will follow in the immediate wake of a declaration of peace?

How can the commission possibly assist, without fatal delay, in the restoration of those duties which the experience before the war indicated must be restored if American industry is to continue to provide a profitable field for American labor and American capital? Certain it is that if some of the industries of this country are to survive, then additional protection over that given by the present (tariff for less than revenue) measure must be given. The creation of the tariff commission will not accomplish this. Only a return to the economic policy of a tariff framed on the broad ground of adequate protection to American industries will meet the situation.

The first step in importance to take, therefore, is the restoration of the principle of a protective tariff, and the second step the creation of a permanent tariff commission, whose duty it shall be to gather the necessary data so that Congress and the public may determine whether any particular schedule has been framed to afford undue advantages to any special group of manufacturers or investors. The general feeling in favor of a tariff commission must not blind us to the fact that that is but one, and not the more important one, of the two steps necessary to safeguard American industry, and that before a commission can operate to the advantage of American industry it must be preceded by a return to the principle of protection.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a resolution in the nature of a petition from the City Council of Cleveland, Ohio, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(By Mr. McGinty.)

Whereas there is pending in Congress a bill which by its terms places a legislative restriction on the weight of parcels carried by the parcel post and places the limitation at 50 pounds; and

Whereas the people of Cleveland are interested in the extension of the parcel post and believe that an arbitrary limitation of the weight of parcels carried will seriously hamper the effectiveness of the Parcel Post System: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Council of the City of Cleveland, State of Ohio, That we request the Hon. WARREN G. HARDING, the Hon. ATLEE POMERENE, the Hon. WILLIAM GORDON, the Hon. ROBERT CROSSER, and the Hon. HENRY I. EMERSON, the Representatives in Congress from Ohio and from our local congressional districts, to oppose the pending bill which seeks to limit by legislative enactment the weight of parcels carried by the parcel post.

Adopted by the council March 6, 1916.
Approved by the mayor March 8, 1916.

I, Richard E. Collins, clerk of the Council of the City of Cleveland, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution file No. 39541, adopted by the Council of the City of Cleveland on March 6, 1916.

Witness my hand and seal at Cleveland, Ohio, this 10th day of March, 1916.

[SEAL.] RICHARD E. COLLINS,
Clerk of the Council.

Mr. WEEKS. I present resolutions adopted by the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in favor of equipping the Charlestown Navy Yard for the building of battleships and cruisers. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1916.

Resolutions requesting Congress to provide for equipping the Charlestown Navy Yard for the building of battleships and cruisers.

Whereas the present Federal administration, through its Secretary of the Navy has declared that its policy is to build American naval ships, more particularly battleships and battle cruisers, at the navy yards owned by the United States, and has declared in favor of equipping these yards for such construction; and

Whereas the navy yard at Charlestown, Mass., is in many particulars better adapted than any other navy yard in this country for such construction, by reason of dock facilities, depth of channel, presence of skilled workmen, and because there is soon to be built in Boston Harbor one of the largest dry docks in the world; and

Whereas it is necessary that an appropriation should be made by Congress for shipbuilding slips, machinery, and equipment, in order to adapt the Charlestown Navy Yard for the construction of battleships and battle cruisers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts respectfully and earnestly calls the attention of the Congress of the United States to the aforesaid advantages of the Charlestown Navy Yard and urge that it be selected for the building of at least one of the said battleships or battle cruisers and that an appropriation be made to equip the yard for this purpose.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the Secretary of the Navy of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives from this Commonwealth.

In the house of representatives, adopted February 25, 1916.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 1, 1916.

A true copy. Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

WATER-POWER SITES.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment by way of a substitute to House bill 408, being the water-power bill under consideration. I ask that it be read.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act lands included in water-power site withdrawals shall be subject to entry, location, and disposal under the public land laws applicable to such lands, upon the payment to the United States of the value of such lands, as may be agreed upon between the entryman and the Secretary of the Interior; and if the value can not be agreed upon, then such entryman is given the right to bring suit, in any court having jurisdiction, against the United States to condemn such lands for the uses and purposes covered in such entry and location. Such right of entry is given upon the condition that any refusal of the entryman, locator, or owner thereof, or of his, her, or its assigns, successors, or heirs, to obey legal orders concerning rates of charge for power and electricity by the duly authorized tribunal of the State in which such water-power plant is situate shall work a forfeiture to the United States of all claims or titles to such lands in a proceeding to be instituted for any purpose by the Attorney General in any court of the United States having jurisdiction: Provided, That no corporation, company, association, or individual shall be permitted to make entry for more than one water-power plant without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That if the water or power shall be distributed in two or more States the rates to be charged therefor shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"SEC. 2. That if any of such water-power plants hereafter located upon the public lands shall be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever so that they form part of or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the generating of water power, or any of the holdings of such plants by any individual, copartnership association, corporation, mortgage, stock ownership, or control, the title thereto shall be forfeited to the United States by proceedings instituted by the Attorney General in the courts for that purpose.

"SEC. 3. That the last paragraph of the act entitled 'An act relating to rights of way through certain parks, reservations, and other public lands,' approved February 15, 1901, which paragraph reads as follows: 'And provided further, That any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successor, in his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right or easement or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park' be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. SMOOT. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for House bill 408, which is commonly called the water-power bill, and is now the unfinished business. I will say to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the substitute provides for the acquisition by a State under certain conditions of any lands therein which are or may become chiefly valuable for the development of water power. I do not ask that the substitute be considered at this time, but that it may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The amendment was read, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

That in the manner and subject to the limitations herein prescribed, a State may enter and acquire title to lands within said State which are or may become chiefly valuable for the development of water power.

SEC. 2. That any State desiring to avail itself of the provisions of this act shall make application therefor in the manner following:

Such State shall, through its regularly created board, commission, or other regularly constituted public authority of said State duly vested with the power to regulate and control the rates and service of public-utility corporations, including authority to regulate the rates and service of any person, persons, associations, or corporations engaged in the business of developing, distributing, furnishing, selling, and renting electric power, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application setting forth the description of the lands sought to be acquired, accompanied by a map or plat thereof, together with proof that the lands described are chiefly valuable for the development of water power, that the entire area of the land described is necessary to accomplish development of the largest available power at the place designated, and that said application is made for the development of water power in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That such State shall submit proof with such application establishing that the lands described are chiefly valuable for the development of water power and are necessary therefor and are being sought for that purpose, and upon such matters and facts being established, patent therefor or for such portion thereof as is necessary for the purpose aforesaid shall issue as hereinbefore provided to such State. Such patent shall include such lands or all portions thereof as are chiefly valuable for the development of water power and are necessary therefor, including all necessary or convenient dams, reservoirs, canals, conduits, pipe lines, tunnels, transmission lines, roads, power houses, and all other works or structures necessary or convenient for the appropriation and beneficial use of water and the power or other products generated thereby and for the utilization and beneficial use of the same.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act, where application is made by the duly constituted authority of the State, as hereinbefore set forth, shall apply to any part of the public lands of the United States, reserved or unreserved, including national forests, national monuments, and Indian reservations: Provided, That where such lands are located within any national monuments or Indian reservations, the same shall be located under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and in such a way as not to interfere with such national monuments or Indian reservations or the uses or purposes for which the same are created.

SEC. 5. That such patent issued under the provisions of this act shall contain and be subject to the following conditions, limitations, and restrictions, to wit:

First. That said State or Territory shall not alienate the fee simple title to said lands and shall retain the same for the uses and purposes in this act set forth, granting the use thereof for such purposes and subject to the laws of said State and the United States applicable to and adopted for the purpose of controlling and regulating such business and the charges and services thereof, so that the State, or those authorized under its laws to appropriate and beneficially use such waters, will carry on and continue the service of generating and distributing such electric power.

2. That each tract of land so patented shall be held by said State and devoted primarily to the development of water power either by said State or Territory or by a municipal corporation or corporations therein or by some person or persons, association or associations, corporation or corporations thereto duly authorized and that said State or Territory shall not devote or permit the same to be devoted to any other purpose or purposes in conflict therewith: Provided, That nothing herein shall interfere with the right of the State to permit the use of such lands for the development and transmission of waters for domestic or irrigation purposes under the laws of the States.

3. That all power generated, sold, rented, or distributed under authority of said State by any person or persons, association or associations, corporation or corporations, and the rates therefor and the service therefor, shall at all times be subject to and shall be regulated and fixed by and under the authority and laws of said State, or in cases involving interstate commerce under and pursuant to the laws of the United States, and that such power so generated shall never be the subject of any combination or consolidation in restraint of trade contrary to or in violation of any law of said State or applicable law of the United States.

4. That none of the properties, rights, uses, or privileges patented under the provisions of this act, where the same are assigned or transferred to or permitted to be used or enjoyed under the provisions of this act, shall ever be valued or allowed to be charged for in connection with any service to the public in excess of such amounts, if any, as the person or persons, association or associations, corporation or corporations, shall have actually paid for the same, and in the event of the acquisition of such property, rights, uses, or privileges by such State, or any municipality or subdivision thereof, no amount whatever shall be allowed or paid by such State, municipality, or subdivision thereof for such transfer or acquisition in excess of such amounts, if any, as shall have been paid therefor and which shall not have been repaid or reimbursed prior to such acquisition of the same.

SEC. 6. That upon any sale or disposition or attempted sale or disposition of such lands by any State for any other purpose or in any other manner than as herein provided, or upon failure to require said lands to be devoted to the uses required by this act, or upon any violation of the provisions of this act, or of the patent to be issued hereunder, the same shall be forfeited to the United States, and the Attorney General, upon the direction of the President of the United States, is authorized to institute such judicial proceedings as may be necessary for the purpose of ascertaining, declaring, and enforcing such forfeiture.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and appropriate for the purpose of and having the effect of carying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of said State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or disposition of water or the right or priority of right to the use of the same now or hereafter vested under and in accordance with the laws of said State.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FORMS AND PROCESSES OF MANUFACTURE.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4724) authorizing the Department of Commerce to make original investigation and research concerning forms and process of manufacture, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit certain amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 1082) for prohibition in the District of Columbia. I ask that they may lie on the table, inasmuch as the bill is now on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state in this connection that I shall deliver a preliminary explanation of the bill and the amendments at some opportune time during the present week.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to give the notice prescribed by the rules of my purpose to offer an amendment to Rule XXII to-morrow.

The notice was read, as follows:

In accordance with the provisions of Rule XL, I hereby give notice of my intention to offer an amendment to Rule XXII, as follows:

At the close of Rule XXII add:

"Provided, however, If 32 Senators present to the Senate, before the reports of standing and select committees provided for in the order of business during the morning hour, a signed motion to bring to a close the debate upon a bill which is the unfinished business, thereupon, at the hour of 2 o'clock, the Chair shall, without debate, put the question to the Senate:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate should be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote, then said bill shall be in order, to the exclusion of all other business.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour on the bill, the amendments thereto and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the chair to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Until the bill is disposed of no dilatory motion shall be in order, and appeals from the decision of the Chair shall be decided without debate."

COMMITTEE ON FLOOD CONTROL.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I give notice of an amendment to the rules, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the notice.

The Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice that it is my intention to offer an amendment to Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to read as follows:

"Amend Rule XXV, Standing Rules of the Senate, by inserting, after the paragraph reading as follows, 'A Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, to consist of five Senators,' the following paragraph: 'A Committee on Flood Control, to consist of 17 Senators.'"

The purpose of the amendment is to establish a Senate committee on flood control.

DISTRICT GAS-LIGHT COMPANIES.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 128), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to report to the Senate as soon as practicable what steps, if any, have been taken by them since September 10, 1913, to enforce section 11 of the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913, so far as the same may affect the Washington Gas Light Co. and the Georgetown Gas Light Co., both of the District of Columbia.

MILITARY PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on next Saturday, March 18, at the conclusion of the routine morning business I shall address the Senate briefly on the general subject of miltary preparedness, and with special reference to a proposal for a reserve force, which I then propose to lay before the Senate.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GORE.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address delivered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] at the annual midwinter dinner of the New York Credit Men's Association, held in New York January 25, be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

ADDRESS BY JUDGE SANFORD B. DOLE (S. DOC. NO. 357).

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address entitled "Military Service, the Legal Obligation of the Citizen," delivered January 7, 1916, before the Young Men's Christian Association of Honolulu, Hawaii, by former United States Judge Hon. Sanford B. Dole, be printed as a public document.

Judge Dole, by learning and experience, was well qualified to furnish valuable information upon the subject of his address. He was a justice of the Supreme Court of the Kingdom of Hawaii, and when the monarchy was overthrown he was made President of the Republic of Hawaii. Upon annexation of Hawaii to the United States, brought about largely through his efforts, he became governor of the Territory, and later United States judge, retiring from that position on December 16 last.

The address I desire printed as a public document is instructive and timely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask to have read a short letter from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the Osage matter that we had up yesterday and on Saturday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 13, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am suddenly called West by the serious illness of my brother, and will probably be gone three weeks. All of the oil matters are in perfectly good shape if Congress does not wish some other adjustment made. I have allotted the gas territory, and satisfactorily to all, upon a 3-cent basis. The oil leases are all ready, excepting as to the surplus lands. As to these I have postponed the proposed auction for 40 days. Inasmuch as congressional action is possible I have seen fit to give a written permit to each one of the sublessees for 30 days from March 16, the date of the expiration of the present leases, based upon the terms of the new lease. By that time I hope that the whole matter will be settled.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

EMBARGO ON AMERICAN PRESERVED FRUITS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD certain correspondence and other information I have secured relating to the embargo put upon American preserved fruits. I think it is an important matter, and I ask that it be printed for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MARCH 8, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

DEAR MR. LANSING: I desire to call your careful and prompt attention to the inclosed telegram from the Dried Fruit Association of California, which states that the British Government is about to prohibit the importation of dried and canned fruits.

The Californians have made large sales and the goods are in transit to New York or at that point awaiting transportation. It is urgently requested, to avoid enormous loss, that the State Department persuade the British Government to permit the acceptance of all goods now in transit from California on which copies of contracts showing the actual transaction can and will be filed. This seems a reasonable request, and I beg of you to press it by cable and advise me with what success.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES D. PHELAN.

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., February 26, 1916.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.:

We are advised by cable that the English Government will immediately prohibit the importation of dried and canned fruits. Large sales to that country have been made by members of our association, representing fully 75 per cent of the dried-fruit shippers of California, and goods are in transit to New York or now at that point awaiting steamer transportion. Will you use your best offices with the State Department to secure representation to the English Government that will permit the acceptance of all goods now in transit from California on which copies of contracts showing actual transaction can be filed immediately in England. Enormous loss to all engaged in this industry will follow if English buyers are not permitted to receive goods contracted and now in transit from this State.

DRIED FRUIT ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA,
ALBERT E. CASTLE, President.

[Telegram.]

SAN JOSE, CAL., March 3, 1916.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Growers' Information Bureau asks that you make every possible effort to prevent British Government excluding dried and canned fruits from Great Britain; also to open avenues of export to neutral countries. Our growers vitally interested. Desire every possible outlet for coming season's crop.

GEORGE E. MERRILL, Secretary.

MARCH 6, 1916.

The Department of State announces the receipt of a cablegram from the American consul general at London, reporting that the British Board of Trade has given notice that a proclamation is about to be issued prohibiting the importation into the United Kingdom of canned, bottled, or preserved fruit of non-British origin, except currants. This will be an extension of orders already issued prohibiting or limiting the importation of certain building materials, tobacco, and paper and paper-making materials. One of the chief objects of these orders, it is understood, is to relieve the import freight congestion.

As a result, in part, of representations made by the American ambassador at London in behalf of American shippers, certain exceptions have been made to these orders, with a view to obviating undue hardship upon persons who have contracted for the delivery to British firms of goods of the kind in question. In the case of fruits a special committee will grant licenses for the importation of shipments which are actually en route for the United Kingdom March 15 or have been paid for by this date. After October 31 next licenses will be issued for the importation of limited quantities of fruits of the kind in question, these quantities not to exceed one-half of the quantities imported last year.

The tobacco-licensing committee gives notice that consignments of manufactured or unmanufactured tobacco dispatched from the place of origin on or before February 15 may be imported upon the production of bills of lading or railroad receipts showing the date of shipment. Habana cigars shipped from Cuba on or before March 18 may be imported.

Similar exceptions are to be made in favor of consignments of furniture woods, hardwoods, veneers, stones, and slates shipped on or before February 15.

[The Secretary of State to the American Embassy in London.]

MARCH 8, 1916.

Re embargo fruits. Department presumes this does not include dried fruit and that any shipments leaving factory or original point of departure for shipment to Great Britain before March 13, or paid for before March 13, even though not shipped until after that date, will be allowed entry Great Britain. Confirm this, and if interpretation is not correct endeavor obtain permission entry all goods leaving inland point before March 13 or paid for, though not shipped before March 13, otherwise great hardship will result to American firms, most of which are in extreme West, far from seaboard point of shipment. In addition inform foreign office that department regards embargo as most drastic and injurious to Pacific coast industries. Endeavor obtain arrangement for passage of two-thirds usual amount, as in paper shipments, without delaying issuance licenses till October.

FRAUDULENT ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10490) to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. DILLINGHAM conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. MYERS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 562.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. This bill has been on the calendar since January 25.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are other bills which have been on the calendar a longer time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved January 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been stated. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is agreed to, and the bill is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved January 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who are out of the Chamber and who are interested in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Doubtless those Senators will return to the Chamber before we shall have proceeded very far with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill has been reported with certain amendments, and I am satisfied that, when the amendments have been explained, there will be no objection to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read as in Committee of the Whole, but the committee amendments have not been stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Oliver	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Overman	Sterling
Borah	Hughes	Owen	Stone
Brandegee	Johnson, Me.	Page	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Swanson
Clapp	Jones	Pittman	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Colt	La Follette	Pomerene	Townsend
Culberson	Lane	Reed	Underwood
Curtis	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Warren
du Pont	Lewis	Sheppard	Weeks
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Williams
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES] on account of illness. I shall let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am requested to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the amendments reported by the committee. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Alabama whether he desires the portion printed in italics treated as one amendment or by sections?

Mr. BANKHEAD. As the bill originally came from the House it contained only one section. The amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is printed in italics.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the amendment as reported is in sections. The Chair inquires, Shall it be considered as one amendment or shall each section be considered as a separate amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest that it be considered as one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, some of us are less familiar with this bill than is the Senator from Alabama, and, while I assume that there is no objection to the bill, I should like to know something more about the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment to the bill simply changes some of the sections of the postal laws. The changes do not amount to very much, but the Post Office Department insists that they are important in order that the affairs of the department may be better administered. That is the purpose of the amendment to the bill. The first section of the bill amends the postal savings law.

Mr. BORAH. Has the bill been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read, but not the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment has not been read.

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair ordered—that the amendment should be read.

Mr. BORAH. Excuse me.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have just asked that the bill as amended be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to add certain sections to the bill, and read as follows:

SEC. 2. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in solvent banks, whether organized under national or State laws, and whether member banks or not of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, being subject to national or State supervision and examination, and the sums deposited shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and Territories thereof; but 5 per cent of such funds shall be withdrawn by the board of trustees and kept with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be treasurer of the board of trustees, in lawful money as a reserve. The board of trustees shall take from such banks such security in public bonds or other securities, supported by the taxing power, as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt payment of such deposits on demand. The funds received at the postal savings depository offices in each city, town, village, and other locality shall be deposited in banks located therein (substantially in proportion of the capital and surplus of each such bank) willing to receive such deposits under the terms of this act and the regulations made by authority thereof, but the amount deposited in any one bank shall at no time exceed the amount of the paid in capital and one-half of the surplus of such bank: Provided, however, If one or more member banks of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, exists in the city, town, village, or locality where the postal deposits are made, such deposits shall be placed in such member banks substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of each such bank, but if such member banks fail to qualify to receive such deposits, then any other bank located therein may, as hereinbefore provided, qualify and receive the same. If no such member bank and no other qualified bank exists in any city, town, village, or locality, or if none where such deposits are made will receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then such funds shall be deposited under the terms of this act in the bank most convenient to such locality. If no such bank in any State or Territory is willing to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then the same shall be deposited with the treasurer of the board of trustees and shall be counted in making up the reserve of 5 per cent. Such funds may be withdrawn from the treasurer of said board of trustees, and all other postal savings funds, or any part of such funds, may be at any time withdrawn from the banks and savings depository offices for the repayment of postal savings depositories when required for that purpose. When, in the judgment of the President, war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires, the board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in the bonds or other securities of the United States. The board of trustees may in its discretion purchase from the holders thereof bonds which have been or may be issued under the provisions of section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910. Interest and profit accruing from the deposits or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal savings depositories, as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue: Provided further, That postal savings funds in the treasury of said board shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act, and not otherwise: And provided further, That the board of trustees may at any time dispose of bonds held as postal savings investments and use the proceeds to meet withdrawals of deposits by depositors. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory" as used herein shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the District of Alaska, and Porto Rico, and the word "bank" shall be held to include savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the chairman of the committee reporting this bill advise the Senate whether the amendment just read would, in his opinion, permit the investment of postal savings funds in the bonds and securities which are to be authorized by the rural-credits bill which is already upon the calendar, and which the Senate is soon to consider?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not think this bill affects that question one way or the other. The bonds purchased, of course, will be under the direction of the trustees of the rural banking system.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bonds in which the postal savings funds may be invested under the amendment which has just been read are only those having behind them the taxing power, whereas the Committee on Banking and Currency has reported to the Senate this rural-credits bill, which, under authority of Congress, proposes to authorize the investment of a portion of the postal savings funds in the bonds of the the rural-credits banks, called farm-loan bonds.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, at the time this bill is passed there will be no rural-credit bonds. If you will include that provision in your bill, as that is the last expression of the legislative will, this fund can be invested in them. We expected, so far as this fund is concerned, that the rural-credit bill would provide as to what should be done with it in carrying out the features that they wish to have in their bill in reference to this matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I presume that should the bill be passed by Congress as the committee has reported it, the provision probably would enlarge the scope of the provisions in the amendment which the Post Office Committee has submitted. It has occurred to me, however, and I think other members of the committee agree with me, that in order to avoid any possible conflict, and to simplify the matter, it might be wise to incorporate in this amendment such language as would permit the investment of these postal savings funds in such securities or bonds as the Congress may authorize.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, we could not pass a law that would change the will or power of Congress. We are satisfied and desire that the rural-credits bill, when it is passed, should provide that in the bill. Nothing that we put in here can prevent a subsequent act from changing it. We had the matter up for consideration in the committee, and we thought the best way for that to be done would be for the Banking and Currency Committee to put in their bill whatever disposition they desired to be made of those funds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The language as it is proposed, in section 2, page 2, line 20, reads as follows:

The board of trustees shall take from such banks such security in public bonds or other securities, supported by the taxing power—

By striking out the words "taxing power" and inserting "authorized by act of Congress," you would harmonize the legislation.

Mr. SWANSON. We have no objection to that. It could be done anyway, but we have no objection, if that will satisfy the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If that is acceptable to the committee, I believe it would be a wise thing.

Mr. SWANSON. We have no objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, on page 2, line 22, I move to strike out the words "supported by the taxing power" and insert "authorized by act of Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill as to section 16, which seems to me——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when we reach that section I propose to move to strike it out. I think it is a mistake. It was put in the bill under a misapprehension.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to hear that, because otherwise I would have felt impelled to make the motion myself. I think it is an unfortunate provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I give notice now that when that section is reached I shall move to strike it out of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment, and read as follows:

SEC. 3. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, is the Secretary merely proceeding to read the bill with the proposed amendments, without any action upon the matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it was the desire of the chairman of the committee to treat all of these sections as one amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I think I shall have to object to that. I think these matters should be dealt with individually, so that we may have an adequate explanation of the proposed changes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would suggest that the amendment be read in its entirety. Several Senators desire to have that done.

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to its being read in its entirety, but I do not want to have action taken upon all of these sections as one item.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. They are being read now for information.

Mr. OWEN. That is what I asked. If that be the purpose, I have no further objection to offer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before we leave section 2, I am reminded by the Senator from North Dakota of the fact that the amendment which I have proposed, and which the chairman of the committee has accepted, should be changed somewhat. I therefore ask to have that amendment reconsidered, so that it may read as follows: Instead of striking out "supported by the taxing power," insert, after the words "or other securities," at the end of line 21, the words "authorized by act of Congress or," so that the sentence will read:

The board of trustees shall take from such banks such security in public bonds or other securities authorized by act of Congress or supported by the taxing power.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would admit municipal securities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska, then, is to reconsider the vote by which his amendment was adopted a few minutes ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. If that amendment is adopted, would it not prohibit the board of trustees from taking such securities as public bonds? There may be many public bonds that are not authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senate has asked for the reading of the amendment in full. I suggest that we ought not to consider amendments while it is being read for the information of the Senate, but that the amendments should be submitted after the reading is completed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At the present time I merely ask for the reconsideration of the amendment already adopted, which was made under an inadvertence.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object to that; but I think the bill ought to be read first, and then the amendments should be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to reconsider the vote by which his former amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will leave until a subsequent time the correction of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 4. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's Order No. 7720, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages effective from January 1, 1914, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after January 1, 1914, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 1 per cent thereof per annum.

SEC. 5. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

SEC. 6. That when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and the weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereafter authorized, in his discretion, to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal, or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territories, commencing about March 25, 1913.

SEC. 7. That so much of section 4 "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected is hereby repealed.

SEC. 8. That section 3949 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All contracts for carrying the mail shall be in the name of the United States and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement: Provided, however, That such contracts require due celerity, certainty, and security in the performance of the service; but the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract."

SEC. 9. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders has been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies.

SEC. 10. That whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when, from any other cause, there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding one year, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law: Provided, That the cost of temporary service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any accepted bidder to enter into contract or a contractor to perform service shall be charged to such bidder or contractor.

SEC. 11. That if any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor.

SEC. 12. That the act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., p. 1126), be amended to read as follows:

"That whoever shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route, or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle, or shall willfully aid or assist in any of the aforementioned offenses, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years."

SEC. 13. That the limit of weight of mail matter of the first class shall be the same as is aplicabple to mail of the fourth class: Provided, That no article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege unless it comes within the exceptions named in the acts of June 8, 1896 (ch. 370, 29 Stat., p. 262), and June 26, 1906 (ch. 3546, 34 Stat., p. 477).

SEC. 14. That postage stamps affixed to all mail matter or to stamped envelopes in which the same is inclosed shall, when deposited for mailing or delivery, be defaced by the postmaster at the mailing office: Provided, That when practicable postage stamps may be furnished to postmasters precanceled by printing on them the name of the post office at which they are to be used, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

SEC. 15. That section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904 (chap. 1759, 33 Stats., 440), be amended to read as follows:

"That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails, without postage stamps affixed, quantities of not less than 300 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter and 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter, and packages of money and securities mailed under postage at the first or fourth-class rate by the Treasury Department: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

SEC. 16. That the Postmaster General is authorized to prescribe a postage charge of 1 cent on delivery of each piece of insufficiently or improperly addressed mail if directory service has been accorded to such mail.

SEC. 17. That the act approved January 21, 1914 (38 Stats., 278), authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty, be so amended as to include Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks.

SEC. 18. That hereafter the Postmaster General may enter into contracts for the conduct of contract stations for a term not exceeding four years.

SEC. 19. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public.

SEC. 20. That on and after July 1, 1916, when the total compensation of any postmaster at a post office of the fourth class for four consecutive quarters shall amount to $1,000, exclusive of commissions on money orders issued, and the receipts of such post office for the same period shall aggregate as much as $1,900, the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall so report to the Postmaster General, who shall, in pursuance of such report, assign such post office to its proper class, to become effective at the beginning of the next succeeding quarterly period, and fix the salary of the postmaster accordingly.

SEC. 21. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out section 16.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, these amendments, beginning with section 2 and running down to section 21, are amendments to various statutes affecting the postal administration of the United States Government and have no relation to the question of the bill which passed the House of Representatives, to wit, "An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System."

These amendments are not germane to the Postal Savings System; they have nothing to do with it; I assume that these amendments are put on this bill by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads because of the exigency and the desire to pass these items and to do it speedily without waiting to have a bill introduced for that purpose under the rules governing the Senate and governing the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives sends us a bill providing for the amendment of the Postal Savings System act. The Senate amends that bill under this proposal by a series of provisions relative to weighing the mails, establishing contract stations, and innumerable other items which are not germane. I think that is a bad practice for the Senate. I think it is bad parliamentary practice. It seems to me that it is misleading. The caption of the bill does not indicate at all any of these amendments. I should be glad to have some explanation as to why this is done.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, nearly every one of these amendments, I think, was included in the Post Office bill of last year as it passed the House at the urgent request of the Postmaster General, stating that he was hampered in the administration of his office by lack of these small amendments which he asked. They were adopted in the House and went to conference, and on account of a dispute in connection with the railway mail pay last year the Post Office bill failed and no Post Office bill was passed last year.

I can not recall a single one of these amendments that was not agreed to by the House, by the Post Office Department, and by the conference committee, except the postal savings provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think the proper place for those amendments—and I would have called attention to it had not the Senator from Oklahoma done so—is in the Post Office appropriation bill rather than in this bill?

Mr. SWANSON. No; if the Senator will permit me, they come in here because they are very urgent and some of them needed now. There is not one of them that can not be easily explained. I will say that all these except the postal savings bank provision were agreed to unanimously by every member of the committee after a full hearing of more than a week, and where any Senator objected to any one of the administrative features it was withdrawn. It was unanimous, except the postal savings bank feature.

If there is any of these provisions that the Senator objects to, he will find the report made by the committee on the substitute, section by section. There the items are explained, with the former law given, and he will ascertain how small and slight are these changes, but how important for the administration of the Post Office Department.

Take section 3, to which the Senator alluded. Section 3 and the other sections simply propose to authorize the Postmaster General to pay for the increased mail that was occasioned by his orders increasing the weight of the parcel post. Congress had previously agreed that it should be not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent per annum, and the Post Office Department has estimated in section 3 and in the other sections the specific amount, and asked to have it included.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to suggest to the Senator, if I may be permitted, that I was not raising a point against these individual items. I assumed that the committee was justified in making a favorable report upon them. I am glad to know that there was a unanimous report with regard to these various items. I am glad to know the House of Representatives agreed to these various items. I do not wish to be understood as making an objection to them as such. I was only pointing out that it is a bad parliamentary practice to put a whole series of amendments that were on the Post Office appropriation bill last year upon a bill which comes over here to amend the Postal Savings Bank System.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me in this connection, I will state why it is so urgent. Some of these contracts are now being let. One of them is in connection with contracts where they want to use automobiles—where they desire a more rapid way of getting to a place than they have now. Under the present system of contract letting they have to advertise at the time fixed and they can carry the mail in any kind of vehicle they may wish. The department wish to put in the advertisement better ways of carrying the mails than are now pursued. These contracts are going on every day. There are contracts for leasing in connection with substations and others. These matters have been delayed here at least two years. The amendments have been requested repeatedly by the Post Office Department. There is not one of them, I think, that has not been agreed on by the Post Office Department, the House, and the committee, except the postal savings bank feature. If the Senator will read the report, he will at once be satisfied that the amendments are proper and just and are needed at once. This is the only speedy way we can get the measure through.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Oklahoma and the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire that these provisions should have gone on the regular Post Office appropriation bill, I desire to say that all these measures came over from the House last year on the general appropriation bill. The committee thought it was a most vicious practice to load down the appropriation bill with all kinds of legislation, and that the purpose of the appropriation bill was to make appropriations for the conduct of the Post Office Department. Therefore the committee struck them all out and passed the bill as an appropriation bill. We hope to do that again. That is one reason why the committee thought proper that these amendments, necessary as they are, should not be put upon the appropriation bill as a rider. They have no business there. Therefore the committee thought it proper to put the amendments on this bill to amend the Postal Savings Bank System.

Now, as to the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma that the amendments are not germane to this bill, he is mistaken, I think. This is not an appropriation bill. The rule which he has in mind applies only to appropriation bills. It provides that a point of order as not being germane can not be made against an amendment to a bill not a general appropriation bill. This is not an appropriation bill. If it was, there would be something in the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Oklahoma has raised any point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood that he did.

Mr. OWEN. I did not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator spoke of the lack of germaneness, and I thought he raised a point of order.

Mr. OWEN. I pointed out that it is a bad parliamentary practice.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, to emphasize what the Senator from Alabama has so well said, these amendments would not be in order to a general appropriation bill because germaneness applies to an appropriation bill and a point of order would lie against them. They can only be in order on an administrative measure like this. The only way we can get them before the Senate is on a bill of administration like this. If they had been offered on a general appropriation bill, not being germane, under the rules of the Senate they would be subject to a point of order as being general legislation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee advises the Senate now that all these items were struck out of the postal appropriation bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Last year.

Mr. OWEN. Last year. I thought they had been reported by the committee from what the Senator from Virginia said.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I made the statement that the Senate left them out and they went into conference.

Mr. OWEN. The committee left them out, the chairman said.

Mr. SWANSON. The point of order was made in committee. We did not have time to discuss them owing to the shortness of time. So they went into conference.

Mr. OWEN. How did they get into conference?

Mr. SWANSON. Because they were put on in the House and the bill went back to the House.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Oklahoma pardon me?

Mr. OWEN. The chairman of the committee said that the committee had struck them out of the House bill because it was a very vicious practice.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I understood the Senator from Virginia to say that the committee had unanimously approved these items.

Mr. SWANSON. The committee had unanimously approved them at this session. In the last session they went out because we had no general legislation on the appropriation bill on account of the lateness of the time. They went into conference and, as I understand it, in conference these amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is right.

Mr. SWANSON. And the reason why they did not become a law was because the bill failed.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit an inquiry? Do I understand the Senator from Virginia to say that all these amendments were attached to the appropriation bill last term and then stricken out?

Mr. SWANSON. I can not say that of all of them. My impression is that nearly all of them that came over in the House bill were approved. The chairman of the committee can state. If the Senator will look at these, it will not take long to convince him that every one of them should be adopted.

Mr. REED. I am looking at one of them very hard.

Mr. SWANSON. They are right and proper.

Mr. REED. I am looking at one very hard, that I think is decidedly wrong, and I shall call attention to it when I get the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to have the Senator state which one.

Mr. REED. The one which proposes to nullify that provision of the banking and currency act which requires that savings deposits shall be deposited with banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. SWANSON. I said that the Postal Savings System had never been included. That is one of the administration measures, and that feature has been changed.

Mr. REED. Yes; most radically.

Mr. SWANSON. It has been changed. I will give the Senator the history of that if he will permit me. We passed a bill last year through the other House and the Senate permitting deposits in State banks. The President vetoed that bill. The Senate and the House of Representatives insisted that in such States, in small towns, where there was no member bank, but only a State bank, it was improper to take the money from those communities and deposit it in post offices and send it to others.

Mr. REED. But that is not this bill at all.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will listen to me, I wish to say that I understand this amendment provides that where money is in a postal savings bank and is put in a post office, the post office shall first deposit it in a member bank, if there be a member bank in the place, and divide the money among the member banks——

Mr. REED. Not at all——

Mr. SWANSON. And if there are no member banks, then it shall deposit the money in a solvent State bank. As I understand that is the provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what we intended.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; that is what we intended, and the committee directed an amendment to be drawn to accomplish that, under the idea that the reserve banks should be given the preference. Then, if there is no reserve bank in a place and people deposit money in the post office, it shall be deposited in the State bank, with the idea of keeping the money in the community where it was put into the Postal Savings System.

Mr. REED. That is the vice of bringing up a bill for consideration in this way. I had no notice, and I suppose other Members of the Senate had no notice, of the intention to call up this particular bill. I can not positively answer the direct statement of the Senator from Virginia, because I have not had an opportunity to read the bill through, but I read this:

SEC. 2. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in solvent banks, whether organized under National or State laws, and whether member banks or not of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment.

The Federal reserve act to which reference is made reads as follows:

No public funds of the Philippine Islands, or of the postal savings, or any Government funds, shall be deposited in the continental United States in any bank not belonging to the system established by this act.

There may be something further on——

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest that the Senator from Missouri read further along on page 3.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Senator from Missouri to read on page 3, line 9, beginning at the proviso, and he will see that that idea is clearly carried out.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I wish to say that, in order that everybody might have the most full and complete information relative to every proposed change, the committee made one of the fullest and most comprehensive reports on this bill that I have ever seen as to any proposed legislation. That report has been lying here for a month. Every amendment to the former law, every change which the committee has proposed to make, and what we desired to accomplish, if I mistake not, has been explained in that report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The report has been on the desk of every Senator for over a month.

Mr. SWANSON. And I repeat that the report was made in such a manner as to give full and complete information as to every proposed change in the law.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to state in this connection that I think the provision to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has called attention was about as freely discussed in the committee as was any other provision included in these proposed amendments. The very point which the Senator raises was discussed; and in a community where there was no Federal reserve bank and no bank willing to accept these deposits in the immediate territory it was deemed proper that such deposits should be made in a State bank, and only under those conditions.

Mr. REED. The matter may have been very carefully considered in the committee; I have no doubt it was. However, we have the habit sometimes, fortunately or unfortunately, of differing from committees. The hasty examination I have been able to make while I have been on my feet, and I reserve the right to change my opinion, and I am entirely willing to be corrected if I am in error, leads me to conclude that the language employed in the proviso, to which my attention has been called, is exceedingly unfortunate. I think it will take out of the Federal reserve banks a large amount of deposits.

Now, notice there is first the absolute provision that the money shall be deposited in any bank, State or national. We find that at the beginning of section 2. Coming to the proviso in the bill we find this language:

Provided, however, if one or more member banks of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, exists in the city, town, village, or locality where the postal deposits are made, such deposits shall be placed in such member banks substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of each such bank; but if such member banks fail to qualify to receive such deposits, then any other bank located therein may, as hereinbefore provided, qualify and receive the same. If no such member bank and no other qualified bank exists in any city, town, village, or locality, or if none where such deposits are made will receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then such funds shall be deposited under the terms of this act in the bank most convenient to such locality.

It seems to me, under that language, that a very large amount of money received by postal savings banks would never get into the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield for just a moment, I desire to say that under existing law that is already true.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I think not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg pardon; but it is. Moneys are still deposited now under the law, as I know of my own knowledge, in the little banks of the locality.

Mr. REED. I only know that the Federal reserve bank act provides as follows:

No public funds of the Philippine Islands, or of the postal savings, or any Government funds, shall be deposited in the continental United States in any bank not belonging to the system established by this act: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to deny the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to use member banks as depositories.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the present law, as I understand it—I may be mistaken—money that was heretofore deposited in State banks was not taken out when the Federal reserve act was passed, but in the future postal funds can not be deposited in State banks. There is a great objection to expanding this Postal Savings Bank System and increasing it, because in communities where there is no Federal reserve bank the people have been unwilling that the money should be put into a post office and carried four or five hundred miles to a Federal reserve bank. This proposed law is based on the idea—and it is well to have it clearly stated—that if there is a Federal reserve bank in a community and postal funds are deposited in the post office, the preference is to be given to Federal reserve banks and the money deposited pro rata among them; but if there is no Federal reserve bank in the community, this bill changes the Federal reserve law to the extent of permitting the money to be deposited in State banks or in other banks. That is the issue.

Mr. REED. That is the issue, and it is a very important issue. The practical effect of the bill, as I see it, would be this: In every city, town, and village where there is not a national bank the money will go into a State bank or trust company, and, as there are a very great number of cities, towns, and villages having State banks and trust companies and not having national banks, and as that number is very much greater than the number having national banks, the result will be that the majority of the postal savings banks will deposit in State banks instead of in national banks—possibly not the majority so far as the amount of money is concerned, but the majority in number of depositors and in number of institutions.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, suppose there is a small town 50 miles from Kansas City which has not a Federal reserve bank, but which has a good State bank, and that in that community $100,000 is put in the postal savings bank. In that case, under this bill, the money so deposited in the postal savings bank, instead of being sent 50 or a hundred miles away to a large city, will go into a solvent bank in the community where the deposits were made.

Mr. REED. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. SWANSON. We thought that was right.

Mr. REED. It will go into a bank which has refused to come into the Federal Reserve System; it will go into a bank which we do not examine; it will go into a bank the solvency of which we know nothing about, except by common rumor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bank will have to give security for the deposits.

Mr. SWANSON. It will have to give security.

Mr. REED. It withdraws Government moneys from the system of banks which we have sought to establish. It is a direct thrust at the Federal Reserve Bank System that ought not to be made. That is my humble judgment about it, and I think this bill, dealing, as it does, with the Federal Reserve System and with the general proposition of banking, ought to go to the Banking and Currency Committee. It was not introduced in the form of a bill and referred to the Post Office Committee. If it had been introduced in the form of a bill——

Mr. BANKHEAD. This bill came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. REED. This amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. This bill. The amendment did not. The amendment was put on by the Senate committee.

Mr. REED. Now, what is there to this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator permit me for just a moment?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I want to make myself perfectly understood. I want to be perfectly candid with the Senate. I want it distinctly understood, so far as I am concerned and so far as the committee is concerned, that the provisions of this bill intended that money deposited in postal savings banks in small towns where there were no member banks, but where there were qualified State banks able to give bond for the safe-keeping of the money, should be redeposited in such State banks.

Mr. HARDWICK. So as to keep it in the locality.

Mr. BANKHEAD. To keep it in the locality where deposited. I do not want to be misunderstood about that. That is the object of this measure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me at this point to ask the Senator from Alabama a question, as I am interested in this bill?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Alabama—not having examined the bill carefully—in view of the objection urged by the Senator from Missouri, if there is a provision in this bill which calls for security to be given to safeguard the deposits made in the small State banks which are not members of the Federal Reserve Bank System?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill requires that banks not members of the Federal reserve shall give bond satisfactory to the trustees of the postal-savings fund or to the Secretary of the Treasury for all money deposited with them.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank both Senators for allowing the interruption.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama says that this bill came over from the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not want to be understood as saying that the amendment came over from the House, but that the bill itself did.

Mr. REED. This bill did not come from the House. A bill came over from the House—a little, short, innocuous measure—which simply had reference to the amount of deposits which could be received from any one depositor in a postal-savings bank. The bill had in it originally a total of 16 lines. It related to that one subject; and if that were the only subject before the Senate, so far as I am concerned, there would be no objection on my part. That sort of a bill having come over from the House, the committee proceeded to attach to it a large number of other propositions. As was said by the Senator from Oklahoma, these propositions are not germane to the subject matter of the bill which came over from the House. I admit a parliamentary right to attach them, but I say that if section 2 of this bill had been introduced here as an original bill it would have gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It ought to go to the Committee on Banking and Currency now for examination by the proper committee of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. REED. For a question; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. How can the Senator make that contention when the legislation proposes to deal only with postal savings funds, and when, in point of fact, the Senate previously has dealt legislatively with this question, and in that case, in fact in every prior case, the subject was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. REED. I make that contention because it is proposed by this bill upon its face to change, alter, and amend in a radical degree the Federal reserve bank act. That is why I make the contention.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, do I understand that in communities where there is no Federal reserve bank he favors all the money deposited in the postal savings banks being sent to cities in which are located Federal reserve banks, or does he favor allowing money deposited in the postal savings banks to remain in the community where the deposits were made? That is the issue, and this bill does not try to disguise it. If the Senator believes that money deposited in postal savings banks in sections of the country and in communities where there is no Federal reserve bank should be carried to places where there is a Federal reserve bank and deposited in such bank, then the Senator ought to vote for the House bill, which is a plain proposition of that kind. If he thinks the money should remain in the communities where it is deposited in the postal savings banks, he should vote for the amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. That has been an issue in connection with the Postal Savings Bank System for a long time. We passed a bill which allowed postal savings deposits to be redeposited in the respective communities, giving no preference to the Federal reserve banks; but that bill was vetoed. Now, if the Senator thinks it is right and wise to redeposit the money deposited in the postal savings banks in banks of the Federal Reserve System and not in the community where the money is originally deposited, provided that community has a good State bank, the Senator's contention is right, because the House bill did that. We have modified it by the amendment which has been reported.

Mr. REED. Now, what is the Senator's question?

Mr. SWANSON. I ask whether the Senator favors that? Does the Senator favor——

Mr. REED. Favor your speech?

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator favor this proposition, namely, where there is a town, say, of a thousand people which puts $100,000 in the postal savings bank that that money so deposited shall be sent to a Federal reserve bank at some other place, or does he believe that that $100,000 should be deposited in that community, if it has a solvent State bank which will give bond?

Mr. REED. Well, that depends. I do not permit the Senator to diagram my thoughts or to specify what my ideas or conclusions may be; and I do not think that I am guilty of any offense against the majesty of the Post Office Committee when I venture to ask a question or two with reference to this remarkable method of passing legislation.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I did not make any comment; I was anxious to know the contention and view of the Senator on that specific question.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will keep quiet for about three and one-half minutes I will be able to advise him, but it is impossible for me to convey an idea to him when he is talking.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I really can not understand why there should be any display of temper because a Senator asks a question about this bill. I can say to the Senators that I am not going to oppose the bill for the mere sake of opposing it; but I certainly am not going to be bullyragged into consenting to its passage until I know what is in it and until I am content with it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he should not overlook the fact that this legislation has never been before the Finance Committee or the Banking and Currency Committee. It was considered originally in the Post Office Committee; and everything relating to the postal savings-bank legislation has come from the Post Office Committees of the Senate and House.

It seems to me, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, that the proposition which he is discussing now is in line with good administration. If moneys are received at a country post office, where there is not a member bank of the Federal Reserve System, either the postmaster must send that money out of town to a member bank of that system or he must keep the money in his safe, which may be a very insecure place to leave it. Therefore, in a town where there is not a member bank of the Federal Reserve System and where there is a State bank, which is required to give security for deposits of this character that are made in it, it seems to me it is in line with good administration to require its deposit in the local bank.

Mr. REED. Of course, the argument for the local community always is a very popular argument. It is based upon the idea that there are more local communities than general communities; that there are more State banks than there are nation banks.

When the Federal reserve bank act was passed, every effort was made to encourage the coming into that system of State banks and trust companies. It was hoped at that time that substantially all of the State banks and trust companies would become members of the system, and that thus there would be mobilized in the Federal reserve banks substantially all of the financial resources of the country; and to that end provisions were placed in the Federal reserve bank act calculated to encourage the joining of the system by a large number of State banks and trust companies. I am frank to say that the result, so far as the State banks and trust companies are concerned, has up to this time not been very gratifying. Only a limited number have joined. It is my opinion that instead of taking action tending to weaken or withdraw the inducements for State banks to join, we ought to be taking action to encourage State banks and trust companies to join.

As these institutions will only join when it is to their financial interest, I think we ought to pause and give careful consideration to any proposition that has a tendency to weaken the Federal Reserve Bank System, and I think the doctrine of local communities ought to give way to the doctrine of the general good.

The Federal Reserve Bank System, in my judgment, has saved this country from a frightful financial catastrophe. There never has been placed upon any banking system of the world such a strain as has been placed upon the Reserve System during its short existence. It is to-day serving the small State banks and trust companies in the most effective manner, because it gives to the entire financial structure a stability which that structure never before possessed.

Mr. President, if I wanted to take the time of the Senate I could demonstrate that every panic we have had in the United States in the last 40 years owed its origin to, or at least found its immediate cause in, some small and trivial disturbance.

The panic of 1907 was precipitated by the dishonest transactions of two men: Mr. Heinze, who sought to corner the copper market, and Mr. Morse, who was engaged in organizing an ice trust. Those two gentlemen were chiefly responsible for that panic. They were connected with certain banks, and their wild speculations in the financial world brought about a distrust of those banks, followed by failures, and by the dragging down of banks that were allied with those that were directly under the control of the gentlemen referred to. The Knickerbocker Trust Co. became involved, and in a few days—in fact, in a few hours—the New York clearing house was compelled to meet. It undertook to carry the burden, and was unable to do it; it thereupon issued orders, which resulted in practical repudiation at the counter of every bank of any size in the United States. It was all due to a comparatively trivial thing.

The panic of 1893 was precipitated by the failure of a single English house—Baring Bros.

The direct cause of the panic of 1884 was the failure of Grant & Ward and the theft by the president of the Second National Bank of $3,000,000 of its securities.

The direct cause of the panic of 1873 was the failure of Jay Cook & Co. and the suspension of Fisk & Hatch.

Of course, there were underlying causes back of all these panics, but they were each brought to a head by the disturbances incident to the failure of one or two houses.

So, going back—I do not intend to take the time to review this history closely or accurately—every great panic that has swept this country found at least its immediate cause in some small, almost inconsequential matter.

With that history before us, I call attention to what has been accomplished by the Federal reserve act. At the time the European war broke out it was only in process of organization. It was, however, buttressed by an amendment to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act which made the money that had been provided for under that act more accessible, more useful. But with those two acts, one of them in process of being put into effect and the other effective, we found this condition suddenly confronting us:

On the morning of the 2d day of August, 1914, upland middling cotton was worth 14 cents a pound. On the evening of that day it had a market at no price whatever. The entire South depended almost exclusively for its prosperity upon that great crop. The cotton lay in the warehouse or remained unpicked in the fields, or was carried to town by men offering it for sale, with no buyers to take it. A financial paralysis spread over the South that has had no parallel in the history of the country. For some 30 or 60 days all shipments from this country were practically suspended. Our international exchange ceased as suddenly as life ceases in the human body when the heart has been pierced. Millions and hundreds of millions of dollars of our securities held abroad were suddenly thrown upon the American market for absorption. Every bank in Europe practically suspended payments. A moratorium was declared, first for 30 days, then for 60 days, then for 90 days, upon all debts, public and private. Yet, with that world-wide catastrophe, with the greater part of the civilized world outside of the United States engaged in a struggle the end of which no human being could prophesy, with all values upset, with all commerce destroyed, with all financial matters in chaos, our banking system stood like the Rock of Gibraltar. There was not a failure of a single important bank between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. That happy condition was due to the wise legislation to which I have referred. Whereas in the past trivial causes had brought on panics, paralyzed our industries, closed our factories, turned our laborers out of employment, swept small banks out of existence, and produced chaos and ruin everywhere, our country stood the fearful strain to which I have referred and stands to-day the one great country of the earth where credits have been and are maintained.

So I say that the small communities and the small banks can well afford to give their aid and support to this great system, and that no bill which directly affects that system ought to be brought forward here in the Senate unless it has been carefully considered by the Banking and Currency Committee.

I agree, and we all must agree, that in the passage of any law that enters upon a new field of legislation there may be found defects, so it may be entirely possible that some arrangement ought to be made for the temporary deposit of funds gathered by the postal savings banks in order that they may be safeguarded until such time as they can be transferred into banks that are members of the Federal reserve system. It may be that something along that line should be done; but this bill, if I understand it from my hasty examination, does not propose a temporary deposit of funds. It proposes to say to the State bank and trust company: "You can stay out of the Federal reserve system. You can shield yourself under its wings. You can have the benefit of the stability it gives to the Federal Government, and then moneys for which the Federal Government is responsible—responsible in the highest and most sacred sense—will still be put into your coffers."

I doubt the wisdom of that kind of legislation. At least, I think it ought to be referred to the committee that so long and so laboriously struggled with the banking problem, and I think successfully struggled and surmounted the difficulties.

Now I call attention to the language of section 2.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was disposed to agree with the Senator from Missouri in his criticisms until I examined the figures of the Postmaster General showing the deposits. Those figures afford a very striking demonstration that most of the deposits in postal savings banks are in the great cities, where member banks exist, and a very small proportion of these deposits are in the smaller towns, where this question would arise.

For instance, take my own State: The total postal savings bank deposits in all of the 600 or 700 post offices there amount now to only $398,000, and of that $275,000 are in the city of Omaha alone. In the Senator's State of Missouri, where the total deposits in the postal savings banks are $1,800,000, $1,300,000 are in the two cities of Kansas City and St. Louis. In the State of New York, where the total deposits are $19,600,000, more than $17,000,000 are in the two cities of New York and Brooklyn; and if we take all of the United States, where the total deposits amount to something over $60,000,000, more than one-third of that amount is in the six leading cities of the country.

To my mind, that demonstrates that the issue which the Senator raises here is comparatively insignificant. The bulk, perhaps nine-tenths of all these deposits, even under the provisions of the amendment which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads brings in here, will still remain in the banks of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that may be true, and I think I stated myself that undoubtedly the greater part of the postal deposits are in large cities. I think the RECORD will show I made that statement. I might reply that if the amount outside is so insignificant, then there is no reason to change the law. But that would hardly be an argument which would be conclusive, neither is the argument advanced by my friend the Senator from Nebraska conclusive. There are deposits outside of the cities, and those deposits outside of the cities will undoubtedly increase. I have not the slightest interest in the world in the deposits being taken to a city or to a city bank, but I do have an interest in their going into the Federal reserve system, because, first, I think it will help build up that system; second, I think it will help encourage small banks to come into that system; and, third, the Federal Government will have the funds in the possession of banks that it has the opportunity to examine.

My experience and the little knowledge I gained while we were examining the banking law led me to conclude that the State banks and trust companies of this country are organized in many States very loosely. We have 48 different systems of State banks and trust companies. There are some States that have a rigid State examination and there are other States which have practically no examination at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. I shall say only a word in conclusion. Our bank examiners have no right to go into State banks, no power to look into their affairs. The moneys that the United States Government receives in sacred trust ought not to be put into banks we can not examine, whether it is only a half million dollars or many millions of dollars. It might be temporarily deposited there. The proposition here is not a temporary deposit, but a practically permanent deposit.

Mr. President, since the morning hour has expired I suppose this bill can not come up to-day, and we shall have an opportunity to examine it. I am content.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I give notice that to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning business I shall address the Senate very briefly on the armor-plant bill.

WATER-POWER SITES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the bill which is the unfinished business be read as reported to the Senate and recommended by the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smoot
Chilton	Jones	Owen	Sterling
Clapp	Kenyon	Page	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Phelan	Sutherland
Cummins	Lane	Poindexter	Swanson
Curtis	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Thomas
Dillingham	Lee, Md.	Reed	Thompson
du Pont	Lewis	Robinson	Wadsworth
Fall	Lippitt	Shafroth	Walsh
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Warren
Gronna	Myers	Sherman	Weeks
Harding	Nelson	Simmons	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES. Before the Secretary begins to read the substitute reported by the committee I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the amendments which I understand the committee have adopted since the bill was reported have been presented?

Mr. MYERS. They have not. I intend to present them in an orderly way at the proper time. I wish to have the bill as reported out of the committee read first, and then I will offer the amendments.

Mr. JONES. The Senator will get those amendments offered to-day?

Mr. MYERS. The first thing after the bill is read.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator if he expects a vote on the amendments as he offers them? Could he not offer the amendments and have them printed in bill form for the information of the Senate?

Mr. MYERS. That is what I intend to ask.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Public Lands reports to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed, under general regulations to be fixed by him, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or any State or Territory thereof, any part of the public lands of the United States (including Alaska), reserved or unreserved, including lands in national forests, the Grand Canyon, and Mount Olympus national monuments, and other reservations, not including national parks or military reservations, for a period of 50 years unless the applicant and the Secretary of the Interior agree on a shorter period as the applicant for lease may elect, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary or convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms: Provided, That for the purpose of enabling applicants for a lease to secure the data required in connection therewith, the Secretary of the Interior may, under general regulations to be issued by him, grant preliminary permits authorizing the occupation of lands valuable for water-power development for a period not exceeding one year in any case, which time may, however, upon application, be extended by the Secretary of the Interior if the completion of the application for lease has been prevented by unusual weather conditions or by some special or peculiar cause beyond the control of the permittee: Provided, That no lease shall be granted until the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State, States, or Territory wherein said project is to be located, providing for the appropriation of water to develop or generate the electrical energy intended to be generated by applicant's proposed project.

SEC. 2. That each lease made in pursuance of this act shall provide for the diligent, orderly, and reasonable development and continuous operation of the water power, subject to market conditions.

SEC. 3. That in case of the development, generation, transmission, or use of power or energy under such a lease in a Territory, or in two or more States, the regulation and control of service and of charges for service to consumers is hereby conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SEC. 4. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice, the United States shall have the right upon the expiration of any lease to take over all the properties which are dependent in whole or in part for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, which may have been acquired by any lessee under the provisions of this act, or the right to take over, upon mutual agreement with the lessee, a severable and complete unit of any such power system, upon condition that it shall pay in a lawful warrant drawn on the Treasury of the United States, or otherwise, before taking possession the fair value of such property, such value to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the lessee, and, in case they can not agree, by proceedings instituted in the United States district court for that purpose: Provided, That such fair value shall not include or be affected by the value of any public lands, rights of way, franchises, or other property leased or granted under this act by the United States, or by the good will or prospective revenues.

SEC. 6. That in the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over, maintain, and operate the properties as provided in section 5 hereof, or does not renew the lease to the original lessee upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as may be authorized under the then existing applicable State or Federal laws, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, upon the expiration of any lease under this act, to lease the properties of the original lessee to a new lessee upon such terms, under such conditions, and for such periods as applicable State or Federal laws may then authorize, and upon the further condition that the new lessee shall pay for the properties as provided in section 5 of this act. In the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over the properties, as provided in section 5, and a renewal of the lease to the original lessee is not made, and no lease is made of the properties to a new lessee, then the lease at the option of the lessee shall continue in existence upon the terms and conditions in force at the time fixed for its expiration until such time as the property is taken over by the United States, as provided in section 5, or by a new lessee, as provided in section 6, or the lease is renewed: Provided, That the original lessee shall have a preference right to renewal over and above any new lessee upon such terms and conditions as the law and regulations then in force shall authorize.

SEC. 7. That where the public interest requires or justifies the execution by the lessee of contracts for the sale and delivery of electrical energy for periods extending not to exceed 25 years beyond the 50-year period herein named, such contracts may be entered into upon the approval of the Public Service Commission or similar authority in the State in which the sale or delivery of power is made, and upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States; or if sold or delivered in a Territory, then upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and thereafter, in the event of the termination of the lease as herein provided, the United States or any subsequent lessee shall assume and fulfill all such contracts entered into by the original lessee.

SEC. 8. That for the occupancy and use of lands and other property of the United States permitted under this act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect charges or rentals for all land leased, which charges or rentals may in the discretion of the Secretary be measured by the power developed and sold or used by the lessee for any purpose other than the operation of the plant, and of the proceeds 50 per cent thereof shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within which the hydroelectric energy is generated and developed. The remaining 50 per cent shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act: Provided, That leases for the development of power by municipal corporations for municipal use shall be issued without rental charge and that leases for development of power not in excess of 25 horsepower may be issued to individuals or associations for domestic, mining, or irrigation use without charge.

SEC. 9. That where the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that the value of any lands, heretofore or hereafter reserved as water-power sites or for purposes in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission, will not be materially injured for such purposes by either location, entry, or disposal, the same may be allowed under applicable land and mining laws upon the express condition that all such locations, entries, or other methods of disposal shall be subject to the sole right of the United States and its authorized lessees to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of such lands reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of all purposes connected with the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of power or energy, and all rights acquired in such lands shall be subject to a reservation of such sole right to the United States and its lessees, which reservation shall be expressed in the patent or other evidence of title: Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore allowed for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained, but nothing herein shall be construed to deny or abridge rights now granted by law to those seeking to use the public lands for purposes of irrigation or mining alone.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine books and accounts of lessees and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of water rights, lands, easements, and other property acquired, production, use, distribution, and sale of energy, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

SEC. 11. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled, by appropriate proceedings, in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice, in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specifically recited in the lease.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water.

SEC. 14. That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking or affecting any permits or valid existing rights of way heretofore given or granted pursuant to law, but at the option of the permittee any permit heretofore given for the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of hydroelectric power may be surrendered and the permittee given a lease for the same premises under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That this act shall not apply to navigation dams or structures under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers, or to lands purchased or acquired by condemnation by the United States, or withdrawn by the President under the act approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases," where such lands are purchased, acquired by condemnation, or withdrawn by the President for the sole purpose of promoting navigation.

SEC. 16. That in instances where only 10 per cent or less of the lands actually necessary and required for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works for the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power in any one proposed separate, distinct, and complete plant or project are lands of the United States Government and such Government lands are to be used only for overflowage, reservoir, or transmission purposes and not in whole or in part as a dam site or the site of a power house nor for the erection of buildings or operation of machinery, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, lease such lands to an applicant for not more than 50 years, at such rental price and upon such terms as he may deem just, free from all or any other of the terms, conditions, provisions, and requirements of this act which the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to waive.

SEC. 17. That authority is hereby conferred upon the State of Colorado or any citizen or citizens directly interested, or both, to institute and prosecute an action at law or in equity against the Secretary of the Interior to determine its right and the rights of its citizens to appropriate and apply to beneficial uses the waters of the Rio Grande River and its tributaries within its geographical boundaries. Such action may be instituted in the district court of the United States within the State of Colorado, and any judgment or decree therein shall be subject to review by writ of error or appeal as provided by law in other cases.

SEC. 18. That authority is hereby conferred upon the State of New Mexico, or any citizen or citizens directly interested, or both, to institute and prosecute an action at law or in equity against the Secretary of the Interior to determine its right and the rights of its citizens to appropriate and apply to beneficial uses the waters of the Rio Grande River and its tributaries within its geographical boundaries. Such action may be instituted in the district court of the United States within the State of New Mexco, and any judgment or decree therein shall be subject to review by writ of error or appeal as provided by law in other cases.

SEC. 19. That the lands leased under this act may be used and the works constructed, maintained, and operated thereon may be used, added to, or enlarged by the lessee or any other person, association, or corporation for the purpose of impounding and conveying water for the generation and distribution of power for irrigation, mining, municipal, domestic, and other beneficial purposes, whenever such use of the water is authorized by the State wherein said project is situated, and under the authorization of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the new user shall not utilize such jointly used property to generate power unless said lessee shall, after due notice by the Secretary of the Interior, and within a reasonable time specified by him, fail to add to or enlarge said works as herein provided: Provided, however, That if said lands and works are so used by any other than the lessee, such use must be without expense or damage to the said lessee.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, after this bill was reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Public Lands the committee took up and considered certain suggestions and ideas as to further amendments which had occurred to some of the members of the committee, and the committee gave considerable attention thereto. As the result of considerable deliberation, the committee adopted a number of committee amendments to the bill as it had been originally reported by the committee. I am authorized by the committee to offer those amendments to the bill as it has been reported as committee amendments in the name of and by the authority of the committee. I now offer those committee amendments and ask that they be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OWEN in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment is, on page 13, line 8, after the words "fifty years," to insert the following:

And thereafter until the property is taken over and paid for or a new lease is executed as provided in section 6.

Second. On page 13, line 17, after the word "terms," it is proposed to insert the following:

As provided in section 11.

Third. On page 15, line 3, after the word "properties," it is proposed to insert the following:

Constructed, acquired, or owned by any lessee, and valuable or serviceable in the development, generation, or transmission of electric current or in the storage or distribution of water to the point of delivery to irrigation or domestic water systems.

Fourth. On page 15, lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Which may have been acquired by any lessee under the provisions of this act.

Fifth. On page 16, lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Upon the terms and conditions in force at the time fixed for its expiration.

Sixth. On page 16, lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Not to exceed 25 years.

Seventh. On page 17, line 3, after the word "Territory," it is proposed to insert the following:

Or in a State which has no public-service commission.

Eighth. On page 17, line 13, after the word "rentals," it is proposed to strike out—

May, in the discretion of the Secretary, be measured by the power developed and—

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Shall be based on the value of the land, to be determined by the amount of horsepower to be developed, and which charge or rental shall not exceed the sum of 25 cents per developed horsepower per year for the actual power.

Ninth. On page 19, line 21, at the beginning of the line, before the word "comply," it is proposed to insert the word "substantially."

Tenth. On page 19, line 25, after the word "such," it is proposed to insert the word "general."

Eleventh. On page 21, line 13, after the word "discretion," it is proposed to strike out the balance of the line and all of lines 14 and 15 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Upon application by the applicant waive such.

Twelfth. On page 21, line 16, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the balance of the line and all of line 17 and to insert in lieu thereof:

As he may deem just.

Thirteenth. On page 23, line 6, after the word "lessee," it is proposed to insert a comma and the following:

And that such new user shall pay to the lessee just compensation for the use of such land and works.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that the phraseology in section 19, on page 22, was also eliminated. I find no report on that.

Mr. MYERS. Let me turn to that. What phraseology in section 19, page 22, does the Senator from Colorado think was eliminated?

Mr. THOMAS. I can not give the Senator the exact language.

Mr. MYERS. Can the Senator from Colorado refer to its general nature?

Mr. THOMAS. The purpose, however, was to exclude the added use of the reservoir for purposes of irrigation.

Mr. MYERS. I think the Senator from Colorado is incorrect. I think that proposition was voted down in the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. On the contrary, it was sustained, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. MYERS. I think that change——

Mr. THOMAS. The change as proposed was sustained.

Mr. MYERS. The additions were sustained.

Mr. THOMAS. The proposal to reject the added uses was also sustained.

Mr. MYERS. I think not.

Mr. THOMAS. So that there is no added use of the reservoir or of the land to be devoted to the purposes of irrigation. I think the Senator from Utah will bear me out in that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I can explain to the Senator from Colorado. As section 19 now reads, it is as follows:

SEC. 19. That the lands leased under this act may be used and the works constructed, maintained, and operated thereon may be used, added to, or enlarged by the lessee, or any other person, association, or corporation, for the purpose of impounding and conveying water for the generation and distribution of power for irrigation, mining, municipal, domestic, and other beneficial purposes.

There was a proposition before the committee to strike out the words "the generation and distribution of power for" and to insert the word "and" after the word "municipal," and to strike out the words "and other beneficial," before the word "purposes." That, however, was disagreed to in committee.

Mr. MYERS. That failed in the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. That failed in committee; and I think the Senator from Colorado will agree that it ought to have failed. If those words had been eliminated, then there would have been given to the Secretary of the Interior power to control the water for irrigation, mining, and municipal purposes, and to that we all disagreed to in the committee, as I remember.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection of the matter is in accord with the statement of the Senator from Utah; but I am also of the impression that we went further, so as to emphasize the added use—if any added use was to be made by others of the plant—that its purpose should be for the generation of power and not for irrigation or for domestic uses.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is true; but if we struck out the words "generation and distribution of power for," then, of course, it would have applied to irrigation, mining, and domestic purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, upon reflection I am inclined to think that my memory is at fault. The purpose which I had in mind was precisely that which the Senator from Utah states, my recollection being that it was accomplished by the excision of some of the phraseology of section 19, page 22.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Colorado that my recollection is that the committee did agree, however, to amend section 19 by inserting the word "diverting," on line 16, page 22, between the word "the" and the word "works," so that it would read:

That the lands leased under this act may be used and the diverting works constructed, maintained—

And so forth.

I will ask the Senator from Montana if that was not agreed to by the committee?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that I have no recollection of that word having been inserted.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me call the Senator's attention to the statement which was made when the amendment was proposed, and perhaps that will refresh his memory. As the section now reads, it provides that all of "the works constructed, maintained, and operated thereon" may be used; or, in other words, that would take the land, no matter where it was located, if it were used in the construction of the plant or in its maintenance or operation. That is not the idea of the committee in framing the bill, nor do I believe that anyone wants the control to go as far as that. I do think, however, that the diverting works constructed should be included—they are upon the public land—and I think the Senator will recollect that that was the position taken by the committee. If, however, the Senator does not desire to offer the amendment as a committee amendment, I will say to him that it can be offered later and we can discuss the question when the amendment is offered.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have no recollection on the subject. I shall, however, be glad to investigate the matter, and if the amendment was made as has been suggested I shall be glad to have it printed with the bill and conform to it. The committee meets to-morrow, that being its regular weekly meeting day. If that is the recollection of Senators on the committee, I shall be glad to abide by the action of the committee. With that possible exception, I think the bill as printed is just as the committee ordered it to be reported out of the committee.

As to the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I think, with the possible exception of the discrepancy suggested by the Senator from Utah, that section 19 as printed is just as it was directed to be reported out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that the amendments which have been read from the desk and submitted by the Senator are the exact amendments which were agreed to by the committee, as I recollect them, with the single exception of the word "diverting," in section 19.

Mr. MYERS. I shall be very glad to submit that question to the committee to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Utah—I have been thinking about that matter—that perhaps if you insert the word "diverting" there you would exclude impounding works, and you would then have it too restricted.

Mr. SMOOT. I took it for granted that diverting works would include impounding works.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Utah will recognize that that does not necessarily follow, for the reservoir may be remote from the diverting works.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true. I recognize the force of the suggestion which the Senator offers, and that should be taken into consideration when we are deciding upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate with regard to the amendments which have been reported in behalf of the committee by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that they be printed and lie on the table. I suppose if there is no objection that will be the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Montana whether he intends to offer these as one amendment or if, when the time comes, we are to consider them separately? I suppose each of them will be offered by itself.

Mr. MYERS. They will be offered separately, of course. I intended them to be offered separately. They were only sent up on continuous sheets of paper as a matter of convenience. They are numbered and will be printed as numbered, but as separate amendments, and my intention is to have them considered separately, each one in its own right and not depending upon the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the present parliamentary status the question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee. Certain additional amendments have been proposed by the committee with the request that they be laid on the table and printed, and that order has been entered at the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to suggest to the Senator, inasmuch as it is almost impossible from hearing them read to understand the connection which these amendments bear to the rest of the bill, that I think it would be well to have a reprint of the bill and amendments, the amendments now proposed by the committee to be printed in capitals, so as to indicate them clearly. It seems to me that that would enable us to see the connection. I listened to the reading of the amendments, and some of them were perfect Greek to me. I could not ascertain whether a given amendment was a good amendment or a bad one, but if there is a reprint of the bill, with the proposed committee amendments indicated by brackets or capitals, we could all get more light upon the subject.

Mr. MYERS. I think that is a good suggestion; and I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that order will be entered. The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in my efforts to obtain a place for this bill the day before yesterday and to have it made the unfinished business some Senators seemed to think that I blamed them for their course in opposing my desire at that time to have this bill made the unfinished business of the Senate. I desire to say that in my very earnest effort to have this bill made at that time the unfinished business of the Senate, I certainly did not intend or desire to reflect upon any Senator or Senators nor the Senators from any section of the country. I hold the Senators from one section of the country in just as high esteem as I do the Senators from every other section, and hold all of them in equal esteem, and I do not wish anything that I said at that time to be construed as in any way reflecting upon the motives of any Senator from any section of the country. I vote with or against Senators from any section and all sections of the country in accordance with my feelings of duty to my own section of the country and according to my convictions of right, and I certainly accord to them the same privilege which I claim for myself.

I desire further in this connection to say as to my effort yesterday to have this bill made the unfinished business of the Senate in preference to the rural-credits bill, that I do not want my action or attitude at that time to be construed as indicating any opposition or hostility on my part to rural-credits legislation. I am very heartily in favor of rural-credits legislation. I have long been a believer in it; I believe that it is badly needed in this country; I believe that justice, fairness, and good government require it, and that it is due the farmers of the country. I am for the rural-credits bill that is now on the calendar of the Senate, having been reported out by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and I intend to support it, and I do not wish the fact that I asked that this bill first be made the unfinished business to be taken at all as indicating any antipathy on my part to rural-credits legislation in general or to the rural-credits bill which is pending on the calendar of the Senate at this time.

I want to see the passage both of this bill and of the rural-credits bill; I am for both, and I am for one just as much as the other. I believe there is time for the enactment of both of these measures, and I hope to see them both enacted at this session of Congress. I think there is merit in both; that each one will bring great good to the people of this country, and I believe that we ought to stay here, no matter how long it may take, until we fully discharge our duty to the people of the country. We ought to stay at our post of duty, no matter what questioning of our motives may result, and in spite of the fact that somebody may accuse us of playing politics or may shout politics at us, even if it may take until election day next fall, in order to give the people of this country the legislation which the dominant party has promised them, which is due them, which they need, and which they ought to have. Therefore I hope to see Congress remain in session until we can be assured of the passage of this bill, as well as the enactment of the rural-credits bill, which is also now pending.

There was a good deal said yesterday about the opposition of the West to the pending bill and the opposition of western Senators. I did not comment on it at that time. I did not undertake to reply, because I thought that too much time was being taken on a preliminary question anyway, the question then being merely, "Shall the bill be taken up for consideration?" I will not digress now to say much about it; but I will say at this time that I believe a majority of the Senators from the public-land States, from the States west of the Missouri River, will be found supporting this bill when it comes to the vote upon its final passage.

This is in no sense whatever a political measure. While the administration, I understand, is and has been favorable to legislation of this kind, it has been favorable to it purely in an economic and nonpolitical way. There is no politics whatever in the measure. Democratic Senators are supporting it and Democratic Senators are opposing it; Republican Senators are supporting it and Republican Senators are opposing it; and so in the committee; there was there absolutely no division along political lines; but it is my belief that all of the Democratic Senators from the public-land States, from the States west of the Missouri River, will be found supporting this bill, except my friends the two Senators from Colorado and one of the Senators from Arizona. Of course that does not go to the merits of the measure at all; but I merely say that at this time because I think the impression was rather conveyed yesterday that sentiment in the public-land States is overwhelmingly against the bill. I do not believe it is. I dissent from that view.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not the operations of this bill will not be confined almost entirely to what are called the Rocky Mountain States? As quick as you leave the Rocky Mountains you get on the plains, which are almost level and where hardly any development of water power can take place. Now, I will ask the Senator if he does not believe that a great majority of the Senators representing the Rocky Mountain States are opposed to this bill?

Mr. MYERS. There is no great number of Senators from the Rocky Mountain States, all told. I have not figured on that; I can not say at this instant. I know the two Senators from Montana, who are from a Rocky Mountain State, are very earnestly in favor of the bill. One of the Senators from Nevada—I do not know whether or not you would call that a Rocky Mountain State—is on the committee and is supporting the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I would consider that a Rocky Mountain State.

Mr. MYERS. One of the Senators from Arizona, as I understand, is for the bill. The bill is a public-land State bill. It applies to all of the public-land States, to all of the States west of the Missouri, and—although it hardly answers the particular question—I am informed on good authority that the bill will be found to have much application in the States of Washington and Oregon, which are not Rocky Mountain States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; they are considered in the Rocky Mountain region.

Mr. MYERS. Very well, if you consider them so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But does not the Senator recognize that the two Senators from New Mexico are against this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I so understand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator understand that the two Senators from Wyoming are against this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that the two Senators from Idaho are against this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I understand that one of them is. As to the other I have had no information.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator understand that the two Senators from Utah are opposed to this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator understand that the two Senators from Colorado are opposed to this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I have had some very strong intimations to that effect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That being the case, how can the Senator say that a majority of the Senators from the Rocky Mountain States, in his judgment, are in favor of the passage of this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I say that I believe a majority of the Senators from the public-land States, the States between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast, are in favor of the bill. I have not carefully counted noses; I have not called the roll; but I believe that on the final vote on the bill a majority of the Senators representing States between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast will cast their votes for the bill, if it remains a good bill. However, that does not go to the merits of the bill at all. If I were the only Senator from the West in favor of it and thought it was a good bill, I would support it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator goes to the Mississippi River and perhaps to the Alleghany Mountains——

Mr. MYERS. I said the Missouri River.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I know the Senator did, but it depends on where the line is drawn. If you draw the line where water-power plants under this bill may be located, in the Rocky Mountain region, where there are mountains and falls, you will find a majority from that section greatly against the passage of this bill.

Mr. MYERS. I said "the public-land States." I believe there are localities in North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma where there are streams bordering on or running through public lands where dams and reservoirs may be put in and where this bill may be valuable.

I only made that passing remark because I thought that what was said yesterday needed some attention; but, of course, it has nothing to do with the merits of the case. I realize that there is a division of opinion among western Senators on the bill simply because there is a division among western Senators as to fundamental principles concerning this kind of legislation. I think that each State ought to present its views through its Senators and leave it to the Senate to say which is the most meritorious. That is what I shall try to do in the humble remarks which I shall make upon the subject.

There has been very much said against the bill and in criticism of this character of legislation at different times by the two esteemed Senators from Colorado. Very much was said by them yesterday in criticism of the bill. As a partial reply to them, I want to read a letter which I have received from a citizen of the State of Colorado. It is written on the letterhead of the Colorado State Forestry Association, and is as follows:

LONGMONT, COLO., January 1, 1916.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman of Public Lands Committee.

DEAR SIR: When the leasing bills come up there will doubtless be opposition led by the Portland Conference of Western States.

Herewith find a protest against its action, not that this body is opposed to the development of water power to the greatest possible extent, but it protests against the way the conference pursued. Their preamble and resolutions put in jeopardy the water of the State by endangering the forests on the watersheds that protect the moisture and hold the water from rapid run-off and disastrous evaporation.

This association worked hard to get the forests on the watersheds set apart as reserves. For six or eight years we have been fighting a movement to get the public domain turned over to the States. That would mean ruin.

The fifth resolution passed by the conference reveals the real attitude of the body.

Our work is forestry, which is one of the great questions of the age—one of the greatest if viewed by American statesmen able to clearly scan the future of this country as a whole. I regard the forest reserves as a sacred trust, and the Forest Service as one of the wisest provisions of the Government for the public good.

Yours, sincerely,

W. G. M. STONE, President.

I read this just to show that the sentiment of Colorado is not unanimous. I would have supposed, from the attitude of the Senators from Colorado and what they have said, that there was just one sweeping and uniform spirit of unanimity there, but there seem to be a few dissenting voices. Here are resolutions of protest from the State of Colorado accompanying that letter, which I will read:

RESOLUTIONS OF PROTEST.

OCTOBER 7, 1915.

Whereas there is a movement on foot to bring about certain changes in the United States land laws, including a feature to have Congress turn over to the States the public domain within their borders, with all its natural resources; and

Whereas such a change would include the forest reserves thereon; and

Whereas if passed into private ownership, as certain citizens desire, it must unquestionably lead to conditions involving the extermination of the forests and conserve the snows and moisture at the headwaters of our mountain streams: Therefore

Resolved, That whatever changes in the said land laws as may seem necessary in other directions, we most earnestly protest against the turning over to the States that portion of the public domain that includes the forest reserves, except as hereinafter stated; and

Whereas it is a well-known fact that our State is unable to meet all the demands for money our present public institutions require and that new needs knock at our legislative doors in vain: Therefore

Resolved, That when the State is prepared with money and men to protect the forests from fire and trespass and able to care for them at least as well as the Government is now doing, and until the State has adopted a forest policy such as would protect the forests at the headwaters of our mountain streams in the interest of irrigation and agricultural development, and until the State has put into operation such a policy and demonstrated its ability to deal with its forests intelligently, we feel compelled to regard any such change at this time as dangerous to the forests, and hereby enter our solemn protest against any transfer of the public domain that embraces the forest reserves.

By order of the board of directors.

W. G. M. STONE, President.
CHAS. L. HOVER, Secretary-Treasurer.

There is, in this connection, a somewhat interesting circular in regard to various phases of this question, with especial reference to the water-power conference held at Portland last September, which I will read. It is brief:

Resolutions of protest against the action of the Portland (Oreg.) conference of Western States relative to water-power sites.

(Prefaced by the president.)

THE REASON WHY.

Why does the Colorado State Forestry Association protest against the action of the water-power conference held at Portland, Oreg., the latter part of September, 1915?

Not because of its desire for the betterment of any condition that seems to retard water-power development. Hydroelectric power is the coming energy to do the drudgery and work of the world. No ordinary obstacle should be suffered to stand in its way. It is destined to take an active part in the transformation of the plains by lifting the "underflow" to the surface, thereby vastly increasing the efficiency of "dry farming."

What we protest against is the putting of our water supply in jeopardy by jeopardizing our water protection.

This the conference does when it proposes that the public domain with all its natural resources be turned over to the States, in order that all control of the water situation pass from the Government.

In asking this the conference overlooks the danger lurking in the request.

If the public domain were passed over to the States, the forests that were set apart at the sources of our mountain streams to protect and conserve our water supply must also pass and become subject to private ownership.

The ever-increasing demand for forest products, coupled with fire and wasteful lumbering, would start a rapid process of deforestation, thereby inviting excessive evaporation by sun and wind lifting and carrying away countless tons of moisture from every square mile laid bare.

It would endanger more than 14,000,000 acres of water protection in Colorado alone; it would lessen the volume of water for every power plant; it would enormously reduce the supply of water at every turn and for every want, and increase evaporation billions of tons. Even the underflow would suffer in a corresponding degree.

In view of such reasons who would not protest?

I read further:

WHO WAS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE VAST AREA OF FOREST RESERVES SET APART IN COLORADO?

It has been said that the Government ruthlessly thrust the reserves upon the people of the State without their knowledge or consent.

Is that true? Note the following:

Briefly, after four years of trial (from 1885 to 1889) the State found it impossible to handle the forestry problem and laid it down.

The association, with Col. E. T. Ensign in the lead, turned to the Government for help, and in two years the law of 1891, authorizing forest reserves, was enacted. During the 12 following years six reserves, aggregating over 3,000,000 acres, were set apart in Colorado.

These for the most part were timber reserves, while on the watersheds of the State were vast areas of forests guarding the resources of more rivers than rise in any other State in the Union, all of which were dangerously exposed to fire and waste. They should be set apart for water protection, and something must be done.

The legislature, in 1903, was requested to memoralize Congress to set apart reserves at the sources of 11 important streams.

Here we find the Legislature of Colorado memoralizing Congress to set apart more reserves, in spite of the eloquent protests we have heard from the Senators from that State against any reserves at all.

But the areas not included were no less important than those that were. Hence something more must be done.

It was therefore determined to ask and urge the authorities by petition for the forests on all watersheds at and above an elevation of 8,500 feet. It was done; and on the fourth page of this sheet may be seen a much abridged list of the petitioners.

Such, in brief, is the story of how the Government ruthlessly thrust upon the people of Colorado the enormous area of forest reserves without their knowledge or consent.

Attached to the pamphlet is a list of the people and institutions of Colorado who in 1903 memoralized Congress, in connection with the State Legislature of Colorado, for reserves at the sources of 11 specified streams of importance. We find enumerated the following:

Denver City Council—both branches.
Denver daily press—7 in number.
Denver weekly and monthly press—37 in number.
Colorado Springs Chamber of Commerce.
Sterling Chamber of Commerce.
State Teachers' Association—700 members in session.
Long lists of citizens from 17 cities and towns.
Twenty-six leading business firms of Denver.
Many country papers, without regard to politics.
Denver Chamber of Commerce.
Denver Real Estate Exchange.
Denver Water Co.
Denver Gas Co.
Longmont Farmers' Institute.
State grange.
Ten local granges.
Bee Keepers' Association.
State board of agriculture.
State board of horticulture.
State Horticultural Society.
Colorado College.
State agricultural college.
State normal school.
State school of mines.
State university.
Denver University.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, with pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Inasmuch as the Senator has referred to the State of Colorado with relation to these forest reserves—which, however, are not the subject of this bill, although I am glad they are brought in, because it becomes a part of the general policy of the movers of this bill to make everything subject to leasing—I want to say that the western Senators and western Representatives did petition for reserves for the purpose of preventing the melting of the snow that would fall in winter until midsummer, when the flow of the water would augment the streams below. But when those petitions were presented it was never dreamed that the Interior Department would set aside in the State of Colorado, for instance, 16,000,000 acres of ground—more land than is contained in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island together. It was the abuse of that power which made the western people resentful.

I want to say further that the Colorado forest reservations and all of these State forest reservations came about by virtue of the agitation in the National Government in behalf of forestry; and you can find in my State some few people who favor it, and they do constitute, as my colleague said, probably 1 per cent of the number of people in the State of Colorado. I desire to ask, however, while we are on the subject, of the persons who have protested whether the Senator has in mind a single political party that has announced that it is in favor of either the forest-reserve system or the withdrawal of water-power sites in the State of Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the political platforms of the parties in Colorado. I have heard the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] refer to them and quote them. He is familiar with them. I am not a defender of all forest reserves, nor of the way in which they are administered, altogether. I believe that under proper circumstances and conditions they do some good. I do not defend the extent to which they have been carried nor the administration of them, altogether. I merely read this to show that there is at least some division of sentiment in Colorado. While the Senators from Colorado have often inveighed against the pernicious policy of Government withdrawals of land—forest reserves and other reserves—claiming that it is intimately allied and connected with the principle of this bill, I just read those articles to show that there is at least some difference of opinion in Colorado. If the people and institutions whose names I have recited represent only 1 per cent of the sentiment of Colorado, it is certainly a very respectable per cent in quality.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no doubt but that is true; but I desire to call the attention of the Senator to this fact: The question of forest reserves in the State of Colorado remained practically satisfactorily solved until these enormous reserves were made. I want to say that the Congress of the United States was so imbued with the belief that the creation of these forest reserves in such gigantic areas retarded the development of the State, because it exempted from taxation every acre of ground that they contained and prevented the development of the mining industry there, and for other reasons, that the Senate and House of Representatives in 1907 passed an act providing that no forest reserves should be established without the consent of Congress. The object was to prevent the departments from spreading our States with forest reserves. After the bill which made that prohibition had passed the House and had come over to the Senate, and a conference had been had upon it, the Forestry Service of the United States—I think it was in the Interior Department at that time—established forest reserves that took in millions of acres throughout the West, notwithstanding the fact that less than two days thereafter the President of the United States signed the bill which prohibited the creation of any forest reserves without the consent of Congress.

I want to show the Senator this map of the State of Colorado, and ask him whether or not he thinks that quantity of land should be withdrawn. All of this land in green, taking in almost whole counties, was absolutely established as forest reserves, a large part of it being established by that very bureau at the time the bill was pending, and only two days before the President signed the bill which said that no forest reserves should be created in any public-land State without the consent of the Congress.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if we are going to exempt these lands from taxation forever, it is of most serious consequence to the people of the West. We can not have development in those States if you are going to have fourteen or fifteen or sixteen millions of acres, equal in area to one-fourth of the entire State, removed from taxation, and then make the other persons who own private property pay the taxes necessary for the administration of the laws of the State, not only over the lands that are privately owned, but also over the lands that are owned by the Government and withdrawn in this manner.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not defend the extent to which forest reserves have been created in Colorado; neither does this bill justify it; neither does this bill necessarily defend it in any way, and it is not allied in principle with the extent to which it has been carried. It is really a separate and independent subject.

It appears that in 1903 pretty much everybody in Colorado petitioned Congress to have some forest reserves established. They thought it would be a good thing, and I am inclined to believe that they got too much of a good thing. It seems that they got more than they wanted of a good thing; but that is a matter between them and the Federal Government, of course.

I shall undertake, I hope at not too great length and in not too long a space of time, to present some of the principles and features of this bill, and to give some of the committee's ideas of it, and to give some of my own ideas in regard to the legislation. All through my remarks I shall be glad at any time to yield to a question or a passing remark or a correction; but if I must yield for other speeches to be injected into my remarks, I shall make very little headway. I like at all times to be courteous to my fellow Senators, and to yield for questions or corrections or passing remarks; but as far as speeches are concerned, I would rather deliver my own address first, in my own way, and then let other Senators do so in their own time, holding myself at all times willing, of course, to be interrupted for a question or a correction or a passing remark.

Mr. President, I think this bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been introduced in Congress during my service here. I think it is certainly one of the most important, and fraught with as much power for good as any other bill, which has been introduced at this session of Congress, or will be introduced. Water-power development has been the subject of wide discussion by a varied class of people and citizens and theorists for many years past. For 16 years past it has been acutely before the American people, and for some five or six years past bills on this subject have been introduced at every session of Congress; but the public sentiment was not sufficiently aroused to give them adequate backing. There was no concern of action amongst those who favored water-power development, and the bills never made much progress nor attracted much attention. Nevertheless, the subject has been one of great study and thought and continual agitation, and much enlightenment has been afforded by the discussions that have occurred and by the fragmentary attempts at legislation; and they have crystallized at this session of Congress, I believe, into some logical, concrete, and clear-cut ideas of legislation on the subject.

The Senate Committee on Public Lands this winter and last winter gave long and mature consideration and deliberation to the subject. Last winter the Senate Committee on Public Lands considered the matter almost continuously for about two months. It had hearings that lasted a month, almost daily, several hours a day, sometimes running as high as eight hours a day, at which all classes of people, having all manner of ideas on the subject, came before the committee, and at great length expounded their ideas and advocated their theories. We had experts on the subject, men who have studied it theoretically and practically for years, not only in this country but in Europe and in many foreign countries, who have traveled and observed the development of water power, the means and methods and results of development in foreign countries; who have had experience with it in this country, who are practical men as well as theorists on the subject. We had before us the representatives of investors and bondholders in water-power projects, the men who furnished the money. We had utilitarians, we had experts representing the different departments of the Government, and representatives of the people, representatives of civic associations and of the masses of the people, who urged that the rights of the people be considered and preserved.

We heard all of these different views, and the hearings were printed and studied and deliberated upon, and after a month's further deliberation, after the close of the hearings, the committee finally reported out a bill to the Senate last winter. It was the Ferris bill, which had passed the House, but came to the Senate and got on the Senate Calendar too late to stand any show of receiving consideration last winter, and owing to the crowded condition of the calendar and other matters of the most pressing nature, such as appropriation bills, we were not able to get the bill up last winter.

This winter the committee sat for weeks again considering the subject, and again the Ferris bill from the House constituted its groundwork. It took up first the bill which it reported out last winter. It took that as its basis, its beginning, and it took into consideration the work of the House in the form of the bill which was passed by the House this winter. And the bill which is now before the Senate represents the latest and best and combined thought, the average thought, of the Senate committee on the subject.

The committee was not unanimous on all points. There were many differences of opinion in the committee. There are some members of the committee who, I understand, are opposed to the enactment of any bill along these lines involving these principles. But the committee is agreed on many things in the bill reported, and if we are to have legislation on this subject it is the opinion of the committee that this is the form which best represents the composite views of the committee, and it is the opinion of the committee that it is the best bill that could be reported out of the committee as it is constituted.

Indivdually I do not subscribe to all of the conclusions of the committee. There were some changes made by the committee, amendments adopted by the committee, ideas incorporated into the bill by the committee of which I did not approve and against which I voted. And there are some now that do not meet my full approval. Upon the whole, however, I stand for the bill as it is reported. I believe that it is a good bill, a fair bill, worthy of enactment, and that it will result in great good to the public welfare of the country at large if enacted.

There are a few changes that have been made by the committee and amendments reported by the committee for which I may not indivdually stand when it comes to a vote; but in the main I subscribe to the work of the committee and, generally speaking, intend to advocate it and stand for it, whether meeting my individual views or not. There is but little in the bill which I shall feel obliged to oppose—a few things—but not many.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With much pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that I think his committee has performed a great deal of laborious work in the production of this bill. Last winter I was accorded, not only once but two or three times, an opportunity of appearing before the committee; and there was no effort upon the part of the chairman or any of the members of the committee either to cut me off or in any manner to prevent a fair presentation of the subject. I want to say that in my judgment the chairman of the committee is imbued with the very highest sense of public service when he presents this measure; and while I differ from him in regard to it, I have no doubt of his honesty of purpose in presenting it.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator. Our committee is, and I individually am, always glad to have the Senator from Colorado, Mr. SHAFROTH, appear before the committee. He is always entertaining and lucid in his presentation, and we are always glad to hear him; and I am very glad to hear him make the statement he has made, and to have it made known from that source.

At our hearings last winter we did not curtail or restrict anybody. We invited everybody who was interested to come before us and to shed as much light as possible on the subject and to express their views to the fullest extent, and apparently all did so. We were glad to have the Senator from Colorado, as well as others, and we were interested in his arguments. If all of the committee did not agree with all that he said, we were interested, at all events, in all that he said.

I believe that electricity is perhaps the most important material factor in modern civilization, in the elevation and welfare of mankind, in improvement in the manner of living, and in the development of the resources that God has given the people of this world. I do not believe it is surpassed by any other material resource in its past accomplishments, in its possibilities for good, or in its potential future development. In the last decade I believe that electrical development has achieved more, and has made more progress, than any other material agency for the betterment of mankind and the development of mankind's resources.

Electrical power is now being applied to uses that a score of years ago, even a decade of years ago, were not dreamed of, and had never occurred to the mind of man. It is now being applied to some of the greatest purposes of usefulness and the most potent agencies of development at the hands of man that are going on in the world to-day. Great as have been its accomplishments, I believe that it is only in its infancy. I believe that the generation of electrical power and its application to the world's work is only in its infancy; that it has just begun; and that the next decade will see more progress in the development of electrical power and its application to the work of the world than has been seen in the last 500 years in that line.

Hence comes the importance of this bill. The bill deals with the generation of hydroelectric power by the cheapest method in which it can be produced, namely, by water power; and hence, I say, its importance. I believe that it is more important, and is fraught with more possibilities of good, more benefit to our country, than any other piece of legislation which will be considered at this session of Congress. Of course its particular application will be to the public-land States of the Union, to the States between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast. It essentially applies to public-land States. It is only applicable, in concrete form, in those States, and, of course, I believe that its benefits will be most witnessed in those States. But its benefits will go far and away beyond those States. Its benefits will extend all over the Union, and beyond the confines of this country.

As I say, however, I believe the bill is of particular importance, more than to any other section of the country, to the Western States, the public-land States west of the Missouri River. There we have a vast domain that is matchless in its resources and its power of development and achievement for the welfare of this country and the good of its people. The resources of that country have scarcely begun to be developed. As great as they have been in the past; as great as have been the benefits of the fabulous gold discoveries in California, Nevada, Colorado, Montana, and other Western States; as great as are the mineral resources; as great as are the resources of the forests and their fields and its live-stock industries, I believe that in the next few years they will be far overshadowed by the coming development of that matchless domain of country; and I believe that legislation will do more to bring that about than anything else that ever has been done in that section of the country—more than even the building of the transcontinental railroads from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast, more than any investment which has been made in that section of the country, more than any other piece of legislation which has been enacted pertaining to that part of the country.

I believe that the water-power resources of that country are among its greatest resources. I believe they are excelled by none in their possibilities and their power for development. Strange to say, this water power, this giant resource, has been neglected more than any other resource of that matchless domain of the country. This great power has been developed less than any other resource in that great stretch of country, which now is the home of millions of people, and which in the near future will be the busy home of many and teeming millions of people. Its other resources have been rapidly developed; its live-stock resources, mineral resources, lumber resources, agricultural and horticultural resources have been developed at an amazing rate. Railroads have been built at a wonderful rate in that section of the country. But its water power has remained in a large measure undeveloped; and I believe that water power, although neglected, overlooked, and undeveloped, is at least the equal of any other resource which that matchless empire possesses. I believe it is high time that we were inquiring the cause for that neglect, the cause for that lack of development. Let us ascertain it, and take proper steps to overcome that cause, and develop that matchless resource, which is now in a large measure absolutely wasted, running to waste, there being millions of horse power going to the sea every year, never to return, passing beyond the control of mankind forever.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that the reason why this development has not taken place was because, about from 1907 up to two or three years ago, the Interior Department withdrew from entry all water-power sites, aggregating millions of acres of land, so that no one could locate and develop those powers.

Mr. MYERS. There was a good cause for withdrawing it; to await proper legislation, and meantime to keep it from being scripped and homesteaded. There was no adequate legislation for its development. There was no adequate legislation, and you can not develop water power on public lands without adequate legislation. You must have some legislation on the subject. Those lands and power sites now withdrawn are simply awaiting the enactment of adequate and proper legislation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator's colleague the other day showed that until those withdrawals were made there was an enormous development upon the public domain of the United States and it then stopped. It is a question as to whether we should surrender to a bureau in regard to this matter or whether we should pass legislation which they want.

Mr. MYERS. I know of no adequate legislation which prior to that time would have encouraged the investment of capital and which could have been expected to continue to develop the water power of the public lands. I think it is generally admitted, even by the opponents of this bill, that there is a lamentable lack of legislation on the subject, and that we ought to have some legislation on the subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that all the development which occurred, and which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] portrayed the other day, was under existing law; and I want to say to the Senator that Secretary Garfield by one order, without any citation of companies, withdrew the land and ordered them off the public domain when they had already built power plants—40 in number—one of which furnished light and power to the city of Denver at that very time, which was situated near Glenwood Springs, 200 miles away. The permit was revoked without citing the parties to appear, and without their having violated a single provision of the terms of the permit which had been granted to them for doing it.

Mr. MYERS. The Secretary had no right to have any such power. He never should have had any such power.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is right.

Mr. MYERS. We want to overcome exactly a situation of that kind now. We want to enact legislation which will not permit or tolerate the exercise of any such arbitrary and tyrannical power. Most of the developed water power now in the West is on privately owned lands. Now we want power developed on public lands. If it be conceded that those withdrawals did stop the development of water power, what are you going to do about it? Are you going to sit down and do nothing? We want to enact some legislation which will overcome those obstacles and restart the development of water power in this country. That is the object of this bill.

I claim that it is the part of good government to enact legislation—not paternal legislation which will give a living to citizens; put bread in their mouths—but to enact good and adequate legislation which will enable the people of a government, through their own initiative, energy, and capital, to develop to the utmost extent the resources of their country. I claim that that is one of the principal objects of good government. The object of government is to better the condition of the people. Society is organized for the betterment of conditions. That should be the object of all governments. I claim that it is not the beginning and end of government merely to provide laws that thou shalt not do this and that; to punish larceny, murder, and other criminal offenses; and establish civil rights and tell the people what they can and can not do. I believe in a government going further than that, and giving to the people of the country laws which will enable them, by the application of their own energy, their own industry, their own brains, their own capital, to develop the God-given resources of the country to the highest degree of which they are capable. It is the duty of any good government to do that.

What is our duty in the premises now? It is conceded that water-power development is arrested, that it is at a standstill, that it is tied up tight in the public-land States, as far as the waters on the public lands are concerned. Whether the fault be through failure to provide legislation or whether it be through faulty legislation which permits overzealous and tyrannical executive officials to bar the development of power—whatever the cause may be, it is up to us as legislators to take cognizance of the situation, to take note of the condition, and to provide legislation which will unlock those storehouses and redound to the good and benefit of the people of this country in all legitimate ways. That is one of our duties here, and it is a very important duty, one that is important to us, of vast importance to our constituents.

The United States has strangely overlooked the development of its water power. It has strangely overlooked providing adequate legislation to develop that resource which is so bounteously bestowed upon us, and which is one of the greatest resources that the Almighty has given the people of this country. Other nations of the earth have not overlooked it. The nations of Europe have not overlooked it; Canada has not overlooked it. Those nations have adequate, fair, and workable laws for the development of water power. They have been for a number of years past developing water power at a marvelous rate, and they are doing so to-day.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. KENYON. I rise merely for information. Has this bill received the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, or has it been disapproved by him, or has it been submitted to him at all?

Mr. MYERS. I am very glad the Senator asked that question, and I will answer it. As a rule I do not like on the floor of the Senate to divulge the attitude, views, or remarks of the executive department, for two reasons. In the first place, some Senators rather resent it and think when anything is said about a department approving a bill we are implying that the bill should be passed because the department wants it. In the second place, I feel that the department can always speak for itself, and I am never disposed voluntarily to speak on that subject. But having been asked the question, I want to answer it, and I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to press it at all if the Senator feels any embarrassment.

Mr. MYERS. There is no embarrassment; there can be none. I say I am glad the Senator asked it. I said I generally refrain from voluntarily stating the attitude of a department, but now that I have been asked the question I am glad to answer.

Mr. KENYON. We have had before us in the last few days a resolution, upon which we had the view of the Secretary of the Interior, and I would be very glad if the Senator could answer the question without embarrassment. If it embarrasses him, I do not press it.

Mr. MYERS. I repeat it is no embarrassment whatever; and if the Senator will give me an opportunity to answer I will answer it. There is no reason for any embarrassment. All I want is a chance to answer. The bill as introduced in the House by Representative FERRIS was in due course referred to the House Committee on the Public Lands, and, according to practice and procedure by that committee, was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior very heartily indorsed it. His letter will be found in the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, which is on the desk of the Senator. He approved the principle—approved the bill in general. I think he perhaps made one or two suggestions of something that he might not have fully approved, but in the main he approved it.

I shall have to explain that a little more fully and go a little further back. Last winter, in the last session of Congress, a like bill passed the House. It then came to the Senate. The Senate Committee on Public Lands made considerable amendments to it and reported it out at the last session. I was requested by the Secretary of the Interior and Senators who favor legislation of this kind to reintroduce the bill at this session just exactly as it was reported to the Senate last winter, in the belief that it would help things along—that it would expedite the bill at this session of Congress. The Secretary of the Interior, I think, very substantially approved the House bill which was introduced at this session in the House. As I said, I introduced the bill in the Senate at this session, by the request of the Secretary of the Interior and by the request of some Senators who are interested in the legislation, just exactly as it was reported out of the Senate committee last winter. That bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Public Lands and by the Senate Committee referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior substantially indorsed and approved that bill, too, although it was quite a little different from the House bill. But he approved of the principles of both bills. As regards the Senate bill, he pointed out some little things in it which he thought might be improved upon and made one or two little suggestions, but in the main he approved the bill.

When the bill came to the Senate from the House at this session it was taken up by the committee, and the committee had before it two reports from the Secretary of the Interior favorable to the principle of the legislation and approving each bill—the bill that had come from the House and the bill that was introduced in the Senate. Both were approved by that official.

The Senate committee went ahead and amended some more last year's bill, so that the bill which was reported out this winter is amended even more than the bill was last winter. We have no report in writing from the Secretary of the Interior on the bill as it now is reported out by the committee, just exactly as it now is; but I violate no confidence in saying that I have submitted the changes made by the committee to the Secretary of the Interior and that, in the main and substantially, he has no objection to them, and he is still favorable to the legislation and the principal features of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Let me finish this answer just a little further, please.

Mr. JONES. Right on that point I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana declines to yield.

Mr. MYERS. Very well, I will yield.

Mr. JONES. I wish the Senator to yield just a moment so that I may ask him whether the amendments the Senator introduced to-day——

Mr. MYERS. I was just going to speak about that next. I am getting to that right now. If the Senator will just give me a chance, he will hear from me right on that point. I had just gotten to it and was about to speak of it.

Mr. JONES. All right.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I say, the committee went ahead after it reported the bill out and conceived the idea that some further amendments should be made on account of further consultation and talk on the subject and subsequent ideas that occurred to the committee, and they adopted certain further amendments, which have just been reported to-day. These further amendments were submitted to the Secretary of the Interior before their adoption, and I think I am in a position to say that the Secretary of the Interior had no substantial objection to any of them which have been here offered; at least he made none to me. If he has any, he has not communicated them to me. In my discussion with him about these further amendments they appeared to meet substantially with his favor and general approval; he made no objection to any of them. The committee thought about making one or two other amendments, to which the Secretary of the Interior very vigorously objected, and they were not made by the committee. The amendments that were made by the committee appear from my conversation with the Secretary to meet with no objection from him and to be substantially in accordance with his views.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. JONES. Can the Senator give any more positive assurance than that with reference to the particular amendment relating to the fixing of charges for the use of the public lands? What I should like to know is, if the Senator can give me anything more definite as to whether that amendment is approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MYERS. I do not want to absolutely bind the Secretary of the Interior in these matters—I do not think it would be proper for me to undertake to do so—just growing out of a general conversation in his office. I have no authority to do so. This is a delicate matter. I had conversations with the Secretary of the Interior, but it would not be right for me to quote him, and I will not undertake to do so. I would rather he would speak for himself. I am speaking without authority.

Mr. JONES. Of course, I do not want the Senator to go any further than he thinks he is justified in going.

Mr. MYERS. However, in my conversation with the Secretary of the Interior he made no particular objection to that amendment. I want to be very careful and painstaking in this matter. On behalf of the committee, I stated to the Secretary of the Interior that the committee seemed disposed to change that feature of the bill so as to make a charge for the use of the land leased based on the horsepower developed, but to provide a maximum rate of compensation per water horsepower developed, leaving him free to make it less. The Secretary did object to that. He said he thought if fixed by Congress it ought to be a flat rate, just naming so much, without any maximum or minimum limit, without any variation. That was his idea, and 25 cents per horsepower developed per year was suggested, without objection from him; but the committee did not see fit to adopt that view exactly.

The committee, notwithstanding that expression of view by the Secretary of the Interior, adopted merely a maximum rate of 25 cents per horsepower developed per year, so that to that extent the action of the committee, I apprehend, does not meet with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. It does not meet with his exact approval. He expressed a preference, if any rates were going to be fixed by Congress, to which he did not object, to have a flat rate fixed, an exact, unvarying rate. I urged that before the committee, but the committee did not see fit to adopt it, and the committee adopted merely a maximum rate. So on that point I feel justified in saying there is that difference between the committee and the Secretary of the Interior. I advocated in committee the Secretary's idea of a uniform rate, but I was outvoted in committee. With that exception, I know of nothing in the bill as it now is to which the Secretary positively objects.

Speaking of our strange neglect of the development of water power when its active development is going on in all the rest of the civilized world, and with reference to the great benefit that legislation of this kind would be to the West, I will state in this connection the United States Geological Survey estimates that 44,049,000 horsepower, or 71 per cent of the total potential available horsepower in the United States, is contained within the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, and Nevada, and that of this vast amount but 1,622,000 horsepower, or three and sixty-eight one-hundredths per cent, is now being utilized. That shows how this great resource has been neglected in the section of our country where it is found in great abundance.

The total available water power of all the countries of Europe combined is 35,963,000, the development of which is progressing rapidly, and yet Europe, with a smaller asset of potential water power, develops much more actual water power than is developed in this country.

In the keen race of nations to-day for supremacy; intellectual, scientific, and military supremacy; manufacturing, industrial, and commercial supremacy; supremacy in every way in which the activities of mankind may be indulged, in the keen competition of nations to-day in conserving all their resources and preparing themselves for commercial struggles, industrial competition, and the supremacy of war, the United States of America, with its great possibilities, is strangely behind all civilized nations of the world.

I will say at this time it occurs to me that we have arrived at an age of the world where it is no longer an easy-going matter for a government to just simply jog along and attend to its routine affairs as a shiftless individual might do. It can not keep up in the race of nations at that gait. It can not keep up in the race of civilization at that gait. A nation like an individual in these days of keen competition must be up and doing. It must buckle on its armor and develop all its resources—intellectual, scientific, industrial, commercial, military, educational, every kind of resource—to its utmost capacity if it is to keep up with the nations of the earth.

We, separated from the rest of the world by a great ocean on each side of us, seem to have been asleep in these matters and strangely forgetful of our duties to our own people. Of course our form of government being a dual form of government, there being both a State and Federal Government, which is peculiar to this country, each branch of our Government, the National and the State, has its own field and proper function, and each is capable of great good to the people of this country. Each is capable of doing its share of developing the resources and promoting the welfare of the people of this country, and neither need necessarily conflict with the other.

In connection with the discussion of this subject I hear a good deal said that seems to breathe antipathy toward the Federal Government. There seems to be a spirit of hostility toward it, a fear that it is stealthily encroaching on the rights of the States and on the rights of the individual. I am as much a State rightist as anybody, I believe. I was born in an atmosphere of State-rights Democracy, cradled in a cradle of State-rights Democracy. I have imbibed it and absorbed it all my life. But I realize that the Federal Government has its proper functions, its power for good, in its proper sphere, as well as the State government.

We are indebted to the Federal Government for much. We are indebted to the Federal Government for the acquisition of all our territory west of the Mississippi River. We are indebted to the Federal Government for the vast Jefferson purchase. Had it not been for the Federal Government and its activities, initiative and enterprise, had our affairs been left to the original thirteen States, our territory would still be bounded on the west by the Mississippi River. At the time that all our western territory was acquired there were those who seriously questioned the right of the Federal Government to acquire territory in that way, and criticized it as being undemocratic and in derogation of the rights of the States. But nevertheless we have achieved inestimable benefits and unfading glory from the Federal Government, and the people of the West are glad of its help in many ways. We were all glad to have the Federal Government aid in the construction of the transcontinental railroads from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast, and open up a vast domain which would have remained a wilderness for generations longer had it not been for the aid of the Federal Government in constructing the transcontinental railroads across that territory. We are all glad to have the aid and benefit of the protection of the Federal Government when we need them. We of the West rejoice that it gave us the mighty reclamation law that has done so much for us. I do not believe in any encroachment of the Federal Government on the rights of the States or on the rights of individuals any more than any other Senator on this floor, but I recognize that each has its proper sphere, and that in order to reach the highest attainment and stage of development and good for the common welfare of our citizens we must have joint cooperation in their proper spheres of the Federal and the State Government.

That is one of the things that I think confronts us in regard to water-power legislation. That is one of the things that has arrested water-power legislation. Up to 16 years ago, up to 1900, our Federal Government did not take any notice of water-power sites on the public domain. Up to 1900, I believe it was, the Federal Government took no cognizance of water-power possibilities, and water-power sites were patented to homesteaders and to other land entrymen without any notice or reservation whatever. They just simply went to the first homesteader who came along to enter the land, and he acquired valuable sites from the Government without any compensation and without any assurance of development. A great many valuable water sites went for naught in that way. But about 1900 the public sentiment began to be aroused on the subject, and in 1901, I believe it was, the present ineffective, lame, and unsatisfactory law on the subject, to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] made reference a while ago, was enacted, which grants merely a temporary permit for the construction of works on the public lands for the development of water power, a temporary permit for transmission lines and for the occupancy of public lands by people engaged in the business of water-power development, and that has proven entirely unsatisfactory. It was a makeshift, an experiment; it was merely the first step in the direction of what was needed. It was merely a trial, and it has proven entirely unsatisfactory.

For a few years there was development under it, but investors and capitalists have come to realize that after the experience which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] related a while ago it is dangerous and unsatisfactory to invest in water-power projects under those circumstances, and under that unsatisfactory and defective law which does not begin to cover the subject, and they have ceased investing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to say that I was upon the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives when that bill was passed, and it was brought to us by the so-called conservationists. The object and purpose in granting temporary permits was, according to their statement, that there were a number of people who put upon the public lands water-power sites, and on that account they wanted to get them out of the way without any trouble; that it was impeding the development of water power. They were urging this, saying that it was a temporary permit, or, rather, that it was a permit that could be revoked—"a revocable permit," I think, was the term used. They said that there was no danger of any legitimate enterprise ever being stopped by that. Mr. Pinchot himself urged the adoption of that provision. It was a conservation measure. They gave an illustration, or at least some of those who appeared gave an illustration to the effect: "Why, you have got revocable permits here in the District of Columbia as to street railways." They said you have got a revocable permit as to the national-bank act and all such acts, which may be repealed, modified, or revoked at the pleasure of Congress. They said there is no danger of anybody suffering by reason of this fact. Yet after that occurred and the power was theirs they invoked that very power as against the companies which had already constructed their plants, and thereby, as the Senator says, made development absolutely impossible. No company would undertake such a thing as that when they knew that at the will of the Secretary of the Interior their rights and powers to send electricity to the various parts of the State and to turn the wheels at the very place where their plant was situated could be absolutely annulled by reason of a revocation of the permit.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think we have all found by experience and observation that the law is entirely unsatisfactory, inefficient, and inadequate, and that we must have something else on the subject, if there is to be any further water-power development. Investors have learned by sad experience that it will not do to trust the present law. I have no fit word to designate it. It is arbitrary, autocratic, and vests entirely too much power in the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator whether this suppression of development, to which he refers, is not due to the wholesale withdrawal of power sites by the Government from location and entry, but for which, under the act of 1891 and under the act of 1866, ample power existed for the purpose of location, entry, and development.

Mr. MYERS. I think this withdrawal in connection, hand in hand, with the fact that there is no adequate legislation for development is responsible for the arrest of water-power development, but principally and primarily lack of satisfactory laws.

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps the Senator did not quite catch my question. Is there not sufficient legislation upon the subject to make these power sites available and permit them to be developed if they were not withdrawn? In other words, is it not their withdrawal which has paralyzed the development of the industry, rather than the failure of the operation of the existing law?

Mr. MYERS. I do not believe so. I think it is the law which vests the arbitrary power of revocation and withdrawal which is responsible; and these withdrawals are facts. We want to enact legislation which will overcome them and, despite them, provide some way for people to acquire the control of water-power sites, and go ahead and develop water power notwithstanding the withdrawal. The withdrawals would do no harm if we had proper laws for the development of power on the withdrawn sites; but we have not. Do not put it on the withdrawals; put it on the lack of proper laws.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield with great pleasure to my colleague.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I understand that the withdrawals of these power sites operate to withdraw them from ordinary entry as homesteads, mining claims, and other entries of that character, and leave them open to appropriation under the act of 1901. Surely the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] would not want to leave these power sites open to appropriation as homesteads?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Colorado would like to see them located and title acquired to them under some law.

Mr. WALSH. Surely, I agree with the Senator from Colorado that that should be done.

Mr. THOMAS. As conditions now are, they are withdrawn absolutely; and with the enactment of this proposed statute the Secretary of the Interior may or he may not lease them to the Senator or to me or to others, and he may apply——

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but what I want to know from the Senator from Colorado is whether he does object to an order withdrawing these power sites on the public domain from entry under the homestead and mining acts?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; or under some act. I think that has done more to paralyze the development of water power in the West than has any other act taken by the executive department of the Government in regard to the public lands.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand from the Senator from Colorado, then, he thinks that those power sites ought to be left open to appropriation as homesteads?

Mr. THOMAS. Unless they are turned over to the State.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, not "unless"——

Mr. THOMAS. Unless they are turned over to the State. I could only answer it in that way. Unless they are turned over to the State, conditioned on the State developing the power sites.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator a question. They have not been turned over to the States. Now, the sole question is, whether, still remaining the property of the Government, the title being in the Government, they should be left open to appropriation as homesteads and as placer-mining claims and open to location under forest-reserve scrip and under all the various other methods of location. Take railroad selections, State land selections; the Senator certainly would not want to have them left open to such appropriation?

Mr. THOMAS. As between the present policy and the policy which the Senator suggests, I am in favor of the latter.

Mr. WALSH. It is not a question of "between" at all, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. It is entirely so from my standpoint.

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. Here are those lands which are valuable as power sites; they are open to selection as homesteads; they are open to selection under the forest-reserve act; they are open to selection by railroad companies under their grants; they are open to selection by the States under their grants. The question now is simply, Shall we leave them open? If we do not leave them open, if we reserve and protect them against entries of that character, I agree with the Senator from Colorado that we ought, then, to enact some kind of legislation by which they would become open to appropriation as power sites. We do not differ about that.

Mr. THOMAS. I think, if the Senator is logical, he ought to go a step further and insist that the Government should withdraw all mineral lands from entry, because, forsooth, a man might get a gold mine worth millions of dollars for $2.50 an acre.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that applies.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question, with the permission of his colleague.

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If a person desiring a water-power site for development takes his plat down to the Interior Department upon lands that are withdrawn, can he ever get the approval of that plat for the purpose of developing that site?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I can not answer any such question as that, except——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator——

Mr. WALSH. Just a minute. Let me answer the Senator's question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thought the Senator said he could not answer it.

Mr. WALSH. I can not answer such a question as that, except by referring to what is done. Such plats are approved every day. The great Hegben Reservoir in our State occupied just that position, and the plat was approved. We are talking about a law. I have not presented any such question as that. Of course, if the Senator wants any information from me, I shall be very glad to give it to him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Montana is very well informed about these matters, and is perhaps as well informed, if not better informed, than is any other Senator on the floor of this Chamber with relation to mining laws, power sites, and things of that kind; but I want to say to the Senator that my understanding is that no power site is approved by the Interior Department unless there is an agreement that the enterprise shall pay a royalty to the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose that is the case——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, if that is the case, there is where the objection is to paying a royalty to the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the Senator will understand that I rose simply to direct attention to the fact that the power sites were withdrawn so that they could not be appropriated as homesteads and mining claims.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are practically withdrawn, unless the company will agree to pay a royalty to the Federal Government. The real fight that has been made between the West and the Federal Government is with relation to that matter, our theory being that these power sites should be in the same position in which they were previous to the passage of the act of 1901, to which I objected at the time and foretold what I thought would be the result of its passage.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, these withdrawals are withdrawals for power sites; they are intended for water-power sites, but the trouble is that there is no workable or adequate law under which anyone will take hold of them. Investors refuse to invest in them under present conditions.

So far as the payment of royalty is concerned, I believe that, if the Federal Government owns the land, the Federal Government ough to get some royalty from the use of it by individuals.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana says that under the law nobody will develop the water power. Will he not qualify that statement by saying that no one will develop the water power after the land has been withdrawn for that purpose and under the restrictions and obligations imposed by the Secretary of the Interior, which the man who desires to develop the power will have to enter into?

Mr. MYERS. They will not do so, because there is no adequate legislation to enable them to do so. Such applicant will have to take a revocable permit, and a man is not going to invest his money when his permit may be revoked to-morrow, either with or without cause. There is no law on the subject to justify him in doing so.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that; but there is also no doubt that before the beginning of the withdrawals of water-power sites capital would invest, because title could then be obtained to the land and now it can not be.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I want to have this perfectly understood, because there is not any question about it at all. Capital does not go into these enterprises, not because of any restriction which the Secretary of the Interior undertakes to put in the permit; but it refuses to go into them because the law of 1901 makes the permit revocable. That is the reason why capital does not go in, and that is why we have got to change the law.

Mr. MYERS. That is my view of the matter, and that was my statement, Mr. President. I do not think there is any doubt that capital will simply not go in, because there is no satisfactory nor adequate law. Men are not going to invest their money in such enterprises when their permits are liable to be revoked to-morrow, with or without cause.

As the Senator from Colorado has said, they did it for a while, but they learned by sad experiences that it did not pay; so they have quit and they never will resume until we provide some adequate law. We have to-day no law worthy of the name on the subject. Now, the question is, Shall we enact such a law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Can we not repeal the act of 1901, and restore the conditions which existed before that time?

Mr. MYERS. We could do that; but I believe we can do better than that. We can enact legislation that will be even more attractive to capital and more beneficial to the people of the country and fairer to all alike.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think you can under a leasing system.

Mr. MYERS. That is the fundamental division of opinion on this bill, of course.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is.

Mr. MYERS. But I do not believe that the objections to the leasing system apply in extenso to this bill. The land that will be leased under this bill is negligible and inconsequential in quantity. Perhaps a great power project will only require a few acres of Government land. Most of it may be on private land, a part of it only being on Government land. I do not believe that the leasing of small isolated spots, a few acres of land here or a section or a half section there, along some stream is going to bankrupt any State, nor do I think it will do any harm to the States. I believe that it will even bring revenue to the States which they are not now getting. So I do not see any objection to the inconsequential leasing that will be done under this bill. If the Senator wants to fight a land-leasing bill or a mineral-land-leasing bill, that is a different matter. The circumstances are not the same in those instances as in the case of this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the difficulty with the Senator's position is this: He assumes that the land is inconsequential—and perhaps the Government might have some authority to lease the land—but he must recognize that according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the water belongs to the States.

Mr. MYERS. And this bill does not try to take it away from them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This bill tries to impose a charge upon each horsepower that is generated by electricity; thus, as it seems to me, doing indirectly what it can not do directly.

Mr. MYERS. It is just a matter of the construction of English. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided time and time again that Congress has power to lease public lands, to lease the public domain. Now, we are confronted with this situation: The people are suffering for want of the development of water power; they are not being supplied with the necessities of life, such as they require and as they ought to be supplied; business is languishing in some sections of the country for want of cheap power; the country is not developed nearly as much as it ought to be, or as it would be, if cheap power were available. We have here this asset of potential, dormant power. Shall it be developed? How are we going to develop it? So far as this bill is concerned, the United States Government owns the land; the States own the water. This bill is constructed on the theory that the States own the water and have the right to the use and the control of the water; but the Federal Government owns the abutting land. It takes both to develop water power. Under those circumstances the State can not develop the water power because it only has one of the two essential requirements, namely, the water. It can not develop power with water alone, without the land; the Federal Government can not develop power with land and without water. The Federal Government owns the land but does not claim the water.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; it has the one and proposes to take the other.

Mr. MYERS. I beg pardon, it does not at all. I do not see how the Senator can make that assertion in the face of the plain language of this bill. The bill expressly states that it recognizes the right of the State to the use and control of the water in the flowing streams in the State, and it is not intended in any way to infringe upon that right.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt the Senator too frequently——

Mr. MYERS. I am always glad to be interrupted by the Senator; quite willing.

Mr. THOMAS. If it is objectionable at all, I hope the Senator will refuse to yield; but I merely wish to remind the Senator that section 8 of the reclamation act was designed to protect and preserve all State rights. It required the recognition of all State laws in connection with reclamation projects, but almost since the reclamation policy began it has been practically a dead letter upon the statute books. Hence I am not disposed to pay too much attention to any expressions in this bill of a similar character, which simply recognize, but which in practice, I think, will hardly pay much attention to, State rights.

Mr. MYERS. Would the Senator do away with our great reclamation act and the great works which have grown up under it merely on account of some hair-splitting, technical, theoretical State-rights idea?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would not do away with them, but in their administration I would observe the requirements of every section of the statute. I recall one instance where, under the reclamation law, waters of my State, or some of them, are transported several hundred miles across a desert to be used by a foreign country, under the pretense that the reclamation act is sufficiently extensive to permit it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Transported for a thousand miles.

Mr. THOMAS. I know that in practical effect, so far as that particular reclamation scheme is concerned, section 8 of the law is as absolutely a dead letter as if it had no existence whatever.

Mr. MYERS. I do not defend all phases of and all acts in connection with the administration of the reclamation law. It may be abused in its administration as well as any other law; but I think this bill is so safeguarded and so plain in its provisions that no doubt can be left that it does not intend to touch a vestige of the right reposing in the respective States to the ownership and control of water within their borders. The bill even goes further and says that before an applicant may get a permit to obtain a lease of Government public land he must first appropriate the water necessary to his project under and according to the laws of the State in which the project is to be located. At every turn the bill recognizes the right of the State to the use and control of the water. I do not expect to convince the Colorado Senators; I know their views are so radically different from mine that I can not do that; but it looks to me like this: Here is a house afire, and here is a man who has a well with water in it but no bucket, and another man has a bucket but no water. Now, how are you going to get the water to the fire unless you use both the bucket and the water? Unless one uses the bucket and the other furnishes the water, how are you going to get water to the fire?

Mr. THOMAS. That is the only way in which it can be done; but the fellow who borrows the bucket ought to return it after he puts the fire out, and I think that is just what the Government is not going to do under this bill.

Mr. MYERS. In this case no bucket is to be returned. The Federal Government owns the land, as proprietor, and does not have to return it. It is not borrowed, and the Federal Government is not going to try to steal the water. I do not think that the man who owned the bucket would need to return it, nor do I think under this bill the Government can take the water away from the States. I fail to see one line, one sentence, or one syllable of this bill which takes away from the State any right to the water, and I should like one of the Colorado Senators to point out anything which takes away from the State any right which it now has in and to the flowing water of its streams.

Mr. THOMAS. I will do that hereafter.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am sure that when the Senator from Colorado makes a statement such as he made a moment ago the idea which he conveys and which he wants to find lodgment in the minds of some is that the Government, owning the land, wants to take the water. Now, I want to put this case to the Senator from Colorado: Some one gets a permit under this bill which authorizes him to occupy certain lands upon both sides of a stream, but some one else has appropriated all of the water on that stream and has built a dam up above the one built by the permittee. Will the Senator desire to assert here upon the floor of the Senate that he thinks under the operations of this bill the right of the first appropriator of the water will be taken away from him?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have not asserted and am not asserting that this bill directly takes it away from him.

Mr. WALSH. In what way does it affect his rights?

Mr. THOMAS. I do think, however, if the Senator will permit me to answer his question, that in the operation of this bill the applicant for a power site who makes his appropriation pro forma—and that is what it amounts to—will unite the two together, and he will use his appropriation under the Federal law for the purpose of filling his reservoir and generating power, and in the conflict between the man who holds the Federal permit and who is operating under the Federal law and the man above on the stream who has such a right as has been described the latter will ultimately, in the operation of what we will call the public interest, find himself face to face with a condition which will ultimate in the impairment of his right to such an extent as to render it largely useless.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Colorado if such contests between two men claiming the right to the same water on the same stream are rare in his State?

Mr. THOMAS. They very seldom occur, and I do not think that contests between a claimant under a Federal law and a claimant under a State law having the right of appropriation will occur with frequency until this bill passes.

Mr. WALSH. In a contest of that character, what advantage will this bill give to either party?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, the advantage, as I have said, will be that this is a Federal law, that it is passed in the public interest, to serve a great public purpose; among other things, to prevent the further extension of the water-power monopoly. It is the public interest which attaches to it in the Federal jurisdiction that in a final crisis will result in its supremacy over the locator and appropriator under State laws.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the Senator another question. Has he not frequently found contests between municipalities and individuals, each claiming a prior right to water?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I have found plenty of them; yes.

Mr. WALSH. Those contests are fairly adjudicated by the courts of Colorado, are they not?

Mr. THOMAS. Those are matters which arise under the State law purely.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. And does the Senator——

Mr. THOMAS. Here is something that will be a controversy between appropriations under the State and appropriations and rights under the Federal law for an alleged public purpose.

Mr. WALSH. And the Senator believes that the one under Federal law will get the better recognition in the courts?

Mr. THOMAS. I am inclined to think that the Federal courts will recognize and enforce a right based upon a Federal law which assumes to have been enacted for the creation of a public right or to subserve a public interest as against one which is merely private in its character and gives a private right.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] what appropriation of water under any Federal law there can be, according to the provisions of this bill? Does not the bill say in precise terms that the appropriation of water necessary for a project must be under and by virtue of the authority of the laws of the State in which the project is to be located?

Mr. THOMAS. The appropriation of the water for this purpose will be under the State law to the extent to which that State law applies. I can only speak for my own State, but I think the law is perhaps general, that where an appropriation is made for reservoir purposes or for manufacturing purposes in connection with the use of flumes, ditches, and conduits the State engineer must approve the filings, and they then must be approved by the Interior Department before any right attaches. This law does not pretend to, and it can not except by express recital, repeal that provision of the act of 1891, which requires as a part of the appropriation the filing of these specifications and their approval by the Secretary of the Interior. Now, that gives it certainly a Federal aspect; it makes Federal approval essential to the incipiency of the right as well as to its subsequent exercise; so that appropriations for these purposes under the State law of my State must be followed by these approvals under the act of 1891 by the Secretary of the Interior. That combined with this proposed statute, makes it practically a Federal appropriation.

Mr. MYERS. I do not see that that gives any paramount interest or higher standing or greater force or efficiency than an appropriation purely under State law.

Mr. THOMAS. If this bill becomes a law, I hope the Senator's conception of its methods of operation will prove to be the correct one, and not mine, but I do not think so.

Mr. MYERS. I am very firm in the belief that it will be.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana a little while ago turned to me and asked me if the State owns the water—and he concedes that it does—and the Government owns the land, how would I suggest that this problem be solved. I will state to the Senator that I do not see what right the United States Government has to say, "Because I own this land I shall insist that nothing shall be put there except with my permission." It is recognized that the United States has no sovereignty over the land. It has a proprietary right only in the land, and it ought to place itself in the same position exactly as the private owner of land, the private individual. So that you could solve this question by giving the State or the company which is undertaking a development of this kind the right of eminent domain against the United States Government, paying the United States Government a fair price for the land. That, it seems to me, would solve the problem in a most excellent manner and would produce development.

Mr. MYERS. I did not ask that exact question, but I am glad to hear the Senator make that statement of his views. Will the Senator say that under the law it is impossible now for a State to condemn for a public purpose land owned by the United States Government?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, I do not know that I can put it that strong; but there are authorities which say that the State has such a right.

Mr. MYERS. I know that is the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. At the same time, perhaps it is a fact that a company undertaking a public use of water would have such a right; but, Mr. President, when you come to the practical effect of the right, I should like to know what company is going to sue the United States? With all the machinery for defending suits and with the Interior Department against acquiring any right whatever, I should like to know what individual or what company would stand a ghost of a show, except at a great financial loss, of acquiring a water-power site?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MYERS. With sincere pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was struck with the statement just made. I should like to be pointed to the authority that holds that Government property may be condemned under the law of eminent domain existing in a State. That certainly is rather a new doctrine to me and a novel one. I should be glad if it could be more fully stated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I did not say that the right existed. I say that there are some authorities who hold that it does. There is one authority that I remember, in the Fort Dearborn case, where the Government of the United States was not using the land for a purely governmental purpose, and the court in that instance held that the right of condemnation did exist. That was near Chicago.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That was merely a military reservation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What was the purpose of the condemnation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The purpose was to put a road or a street through a reservation.

Mr. SMOOT. It was a military reservation which had been abandoned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; a military reservation which had been abandoned, and it was held that it was a subject of eminent domain; but of course it could not be done as against anything which the Government used.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course we have a general statute which says that the right for highways can be secured by following a certain procedure; but in the absence of any statute I can hardly see how the Government of the United States can be made subject to a suit at the instance of a State or anybody else.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will merely say to the Senator from Wyoming that during the course of this discussion it is my purpose, among other things, to assert and contend for the proposition that this right of condemnation, this sovereign power of eminent domain, does exist in the States, and can be exercised against any property except that held by the Government for purely governmental purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator will have a very willing listener in me. For my part, I wish he would be able to convince the courts of the same thing.

Mr. THOMAS. I may not be able to sustain the contention, but I think I can at least convince the Senator that there is good ground for the proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly there ought to be good ground for the proposition; because, as was said by the junior Senator from Colorado, the United States as a proprietor ought to stand in no different or superior position than an individual.

Mr. THOMAS. I confess that I was very much surprised, upon examining the question, to discover the extent to which the authorities, both State and Federal, go in supporting the existence of this sovereign power against all property of any State, except, of course, that property of the Government which is used specifically for purely governmental purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I shall listen to the Senator with a great deal of interest.

Mr. SMOOT. So shall I.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in the case just cited by some of the Senators who had the floor, the ground was used as a military reservation, but that use was abandoned. Thereupon it became public domain of the United States and was none the less the public land of the United States Government. I asked the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] his views on that subject and I ascertained what they were. I am aware that there are some authorities holding that the States or individuals may condemn lands of the United States Government for public uses. I do not think the question has ever been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. That is my information—that it never has reached the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Not directly; but in the Chicago case to which my colleague has referred, the Fort Dearborn case, found in one of the Howard Reports, the principle is directly recognized by that court.

Mr. MYERS. That is very interesting. I shall be glad to hear the views of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on the subject when he comes to discuss it.

The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], with whom I have had more or less of a running colloquy, has said a good deal about the views of conservationists in regard to the enactment of the law of 1901. I desire to say that I am not fully in accord with the views of some conservationists. I do not defend all of their views by any means at all. I do not stand here for that purpose, and I do not think this bill reflects all of their views. They advocate some things to which I can not subscribe. While this is called a conservation measure, and I believe it is in the true sense a conservation measure, I think it really ought to be called a development measure. It is a great development measure, for the development of our great potential water-power resources. That is a better name for the bill, I think—a bill for developing the resources of our country for the benefit of the people.

The United States Government owns these public lands as proprietor; and, I think, in the language of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], it owns them as any other proprietor does. If they are subject to the right of eminent domain, all right; let it be so. If they are not so subject under the law, there is no private owner of property who is going to go to work and seek to have his lands made subject to the right of eminent domain. The Government owns its land as proprietor, the same an an individual does. I say, therefore, according to the same principle, that if it is used by anybody else the proprietor ought to have some compensation for it. I think it is right and proper that the proprietor should have some compensation, and not give it away.

The State owning the water, and the Federal Government owning the land abutting the water, when it takes both land and water to develop water power, I do not see, to save my life, how it is going to be developed in any way other than by the joint operation of both, putting the two together. It is the only way. It is the sane and reasonable idea. Better cooperation than inactivity, waste, stagnation.

DEATH OF SENATOR SHIVELY.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the saddest duty of my official life now devolves upon me. It is to convey to the Senate the sad intelligence of the death of that distinguished Member of this body, my colleague, the Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, of Indiana.

At another time I shall have occasion to say more regarding the life and character of the deceased. At present I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask that they may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 129) were read and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, late a Senator from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from Washington to South Bend, Ind., for burial in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The Vice President, in compliance with the provision of the second resolution, appointed Mr. KERN, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. KENYON, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. JAMES, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of Senator SHIVELY I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 15, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful God, our heavenly Father, we lift up our hearts in love and gratitude to Thee for all the rich and varied blessings with which Thou hast surrounded us in this beautiful world; especially for the intellectual, moral, and spiritual endowments through which we are able to appreciate and enjoy. That we may use these precious gifts to the end for which they were intended, make us susceptible, we beseech Thee, to that silent yet potent influence which is ever going out from Thee unto the hearts of Thy children, that we may be led into all truth and holiness; in the name of Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WATER POWER.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to place in the RECORD a letter addressed to the President of the United States on the water-power situation, and his reply thereto. It is unnecessary for me to state that I should not print the President's letter without his consent. I ask unanimous consent to place these letters in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from himself to the President, and from the President to him, on the subject of water power. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a resolution from The Bronx Board of Trade, and my reply thereto.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What about?

Mr. FREAR. On the subject of rivers and harbors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a resolution from The Bronx Board of Trade and his reply thereto on the subject of waterways.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there anything about me in your letter?

Mr. FREAR. Not a word.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

STATISTICS OF LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of the bill (H. R. 13111) authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to collect and publish statistics of leaf tobacco. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that so far as the Committee on Ways and Means are concerned we have no objection to that change of reference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. For the present I object.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution creating a joint commission of Congress to be known as the Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 12207), with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose at its last session there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], to which amendment the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] had made a point of order. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, after which the Chair will hear the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] on his point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BORLAND offers the following amendment as a new section on page 150:

"SEC. 6. That the number of persons in the classified service authorized to be employed in the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia shall be reduced by one-tenth on or before the 30th day of June, 1917, and in order that such reduction may be made without loss of service to the Government and to equalize the hours of work required of those in the classified employments of the United States it is made the heads of the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia to hereafter require, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1899, approved March 15, 1898, not less than eight hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the classified employees in those branches of the public service in which such employees are now required to work eight hours a day."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, an amendment, to be in order under the so-called Holman rule, must be germane to the subject matter of the bill. In my opinion, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is not germane to the subject matter of this bill.

This is a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes. In my opinion, an amendment offered in this way, proposing to affect the hours of service of the clerks in executive departments, is not germane to a bill of this character.

Furthermore, the language of the first part of the amendment is such that it is very doubtful as to whether the result sought to be accomplished or assumed to be sought to be accomplished would be accomplished during the period for which this bill makes appropriations. I will not take up the time of the Chair in a lengthy discussion of that point. I think, however, it may well be argued that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

But an amendment, in order to come within exceptions contained in the Holman rule against the general prohibition of new legislation, must retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number or salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and so forth.

It is evidently intended or expected to bring this amendment within the Holman rule by a reduction of the number of the officers of the United States. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this amendment does nothing of the kind, that the first portion of this amendment, which has reference to the reduction of the number of clerks, is not effective substantive legislation. It is a mere resolution of intention, and would not be effective in the accomplishment of the reduction of the number of clerks in the executive departments unless it were followed by legislation putting into effect what is here a mere resolution. I call the attention of the Chair to the language of the amendment:

That the number of persons in the classified service authorized to be employed in the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia shall be reduced by one-tenth on or before the 30th day of June, 1917.

That is a mere resolution. It is not self-executing. It does not make it the duty of anyone under the Government to reduce the number of clerks, and, as a matter of fact, unless some head of a Government department assumed an authority which this language does not give him to reduce the number of clerks, there could be no such reduction as this resolution suggests.

It does not come within the rule, because an amendment in order to come within the rule must contain a self-executing proposition, must by its own force and effect actually accomplish the result of reducing the number of clerks and employees. No such result would necessarily follow the adoption of an amendment of this character.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Chair to another point. It may be said that there is some ground for argument relative to the germane character of the amendment. There is some ground for argument on both sides of that question. There is ground for argument and for difference of opinion as to whether or not the part of the amendment which I have read does come within the Holman rule by the reduction of the number of employees in the Government service. But there can be no difference of opinion, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, upon the further point that this amendment contains two separate, distinct, substantive propositions. In other words, it is a divisible amendment. The test is this: Were this amendment offered and the point of order not made, or were the point of order overruled and a demand to divide the question made, would that demand be entertained by the Chair? Unquestionably such a demand would be entertained by the Chair. There are three separate propositions here. First—

The number of persons in the classified service authorized to be employed in the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia shall be reduced by one-tenth on or before the 30th day of June, 1917.

I question whether it is more than a resolution, but whatever it is it is complete of and by itself. It has no necessary relation whatever to what follows. What follows is:

And in order that such reduction may be made without loss of service to the Government and to equalize the hours of work required of those in the classified employments of the United States it is made the heads—

And so forth, which is merely a recitation, not law; the expression of an opinion or the suggestion of a purpose; and then follows the substantive proposition. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] left out two words, which I am perfectly willing shall be inserted so that the amendment may be understandable. He intended to say "it is made the duty of heads of the several executive departments," whereas he simply said "it is made the heads of the several executive departments," and so forth.

What he intended to say was that—

It is made the duty of heads of the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia to hereafter require, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1899, approved March 15, 1898, not less than eight hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to the fact that he must be reading from his own copy, because, if he will examine the amendment as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he will find that the words "duty of" are in the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I am reading from a copy which the gentleman himself handed to me.

Mr. BORLAND. If he will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he will find those words in the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I followed the reading of the Clerk very carefully a moment ago, and I know when the amendment was offered the gentleman attempted to modify it; but, as a matter of fact, he did not, and as the reading clerk just read it the amendment is as I have stated. If the gentleman has any doubt about it, I will ask that the Clerk may again read that part of it.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not any doubt about it, and I refer the gentleman to the page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. But I am assuming that the reading clerk is the authority.

Mr. BORLAND. I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that the Clerk again read that beginning with the words——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the official amendment at the Clerk's desk does not contain the words "duty of," but, without objection, it will be so modified by inserting those words in the original amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, do I understand that the gentleman claims that he left those words out because he had brain-fag from working so hard over it? [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman never stated anything of the kind.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, because I have no disposition to take advantage of any such thing——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Wyoming to discuss the point of order, as the Chair does not think all of this has anything to do with the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. But it is rather important that the gentleman should get his amendment corrected in order that we may understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Wyoming to say that he would not object to it, and the Chair was simply putting the proposition—without objection, it will be so amended. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on this question of the divisibility of the amendment, before I call the attention of the Chair to the rulings directly in point, I desire to make this suggestion: The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] will plead with the Chair that there must be a liberal construction of this so-called Holman rule in order that it may not lose its force and effectiveness.

It is not the fault of the Chair that the gentleman from Missouri is not able to draw an amendment which will come within the Holman rule. My opinion is that it would be perfectly easy to draw an amendment covering this matter which would come within the Holman rule. It is not the fault of the Chair that the gentleman from Missouri either is not able to do that or has not seen fit to do it. He possible had some purpose in offering an amendment which would be subject to the point of order. If gentlemen may present to the committee any sort of a hastily drawn amendment and then plead with the Chair that the Holman rule must be upheld without regard to the character of the amendment, we will have all sorts of amendments thrown in here and placed upon bills upon the theory that some gentlemen having hoped to come within the Holman rule, having possibly intended to come within the Holman rule, therefore the amendment must be accepted because of good intentions.

There have been at least three decisions directly upon this point of the divisibility of amendment in connection with amendments offered under the Holman rule. I am sure the Chair is familiar with all of them, because the Chair placed a brief of all of those decisions in the rules. An interesting feature of those discussions is that that occurred in the House when the honored author of the Holman rule occupied a seat upon this floor, and in at least one of those cases Mr. Holman himself participated in the discussion. Men like Mr. Dingley, Mr. Richardson, Mr. Holman, Mr. Blount, and others took part in those decisions, and in two of those cases there were appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the House, by an overwhelming vote, sustained the Chair in its decision that an amendment, in order to come within the Holman rule, must contain only one substantive proposition; that you could not bring in an amendment clearly within the Holman rule merely as a vehicle, a carriage, for all manner and kinds of legislation which otherwise could not be held in order. The first of these cases—and I will be brief, because I think the Chair is fully informed with regard to them—was in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. Dockery, one of the best parliamentarians of the day, was the chairman. In that case there was a reduction in the amount carried in the bill and a provision connected with it, in very much the same way that the second proposition is connected here, which took from the Postmaster General his discretion in certain matters; new legislation, a substantive proposition. In that case it was stated, as may well be said in this case, "that the two propositions are as distinct and separate as night and day," although, as in this case, the attempt was made to hang them together. It has been held in one or two cases that two propositions separate and distinct can not be united by mere grammatical construction; that you can not hang two separate propositions together by words attempting to combine them into one proposition which does not in fact accomplish that purpose. The decision in question is found in the RECORD of the first session of the Fifty-second Congress, page 4959—I will not take the time of the Chair to read it. I hope that the Chair has that decision fresh in his mind. The second was in the same Congress a few days later, found in the RECORD of the Fifty-second Congress, pages 5003 and 5004. In that case attention was called to the ruling of the day before, and Mr. Dockery, who was the chairman the day before, Mr. Buchanan, of Virginia, occupying the chair at that time, called attention to that decision as one clearly in point. In that second case it is true that it was held that one part of an amendment was not germane to the bill, but the question decided was, in fact, the question of the divisibility of the amendment. It was held that it could be divided into two separate parts and each contained a complete, independent, or substantive proposition.

Now, perhaps the most important of those cases is the last, to which I wish to call the attention of the Chair, a full record of which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, page 1392. An amendment was offered by Mr. Dingley, of Maine. Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, one of the ablest parliamentarians of the time and later the minority leader of this House, was in the chair and rendered the decision. The discussion was participated in by Mr. Holman, the author of the Holman rule, by Mr. Dingley, by Mr. Richardson, by Mr. Blanchard, one of the able parliamentarians of the time.

The matter was discussed at considerable length, and the Chair ruled that there were two separate substantive propositions such as would be divided on a demand for a division. That being true, and one of them being subject to the point of order, the entire amendment went out. Now, I take it for granted that the Chair has no doubt but what the second and third propositions contained herein—the one contained in the body of the amendment and the one contained in the proviso—are subject to the point of order, because they do not come within any of the exceptions contained in the second paragraph of the Holman rule. They are new legislation. They do not reduce the number or the salary or the compensation of any of the officers of the United States. They do not reduce the amount carried in the bill. They are therefore clearly, beyond all question or controversy, subject to the rule of prohibition against change of existing law on an appropriation bill. They are separate, distinct, and unrelated to the first proposition, which is the part of the amendment which it is claimed brings the amendment within the rule. Inasmuch as you can separate them, and inasmuch as the Chair would separate them on demand—inasmuch as when separated one, at least, is subject to the point of order—therefore the entire amendment is subject to the point of order and must go out.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the Holman rule, so-called, clearly contemplates the addition of legislation to an appropriation bill. It is something more far-reaching than the simple proposition of reducing the amount carried in the bill. It is made for the purpose of permitting the incorporation of legislation in a bill, and legislation means a change of existing law in some direction. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] belongs to a school of political thought which does not believe in the Holman rule, and it is very natural that he should view the Holman rule with great strictness. It is very natural that he should limit its operation and, with his mental processes, would go to the extent of limiting the remedial force of the Holman rule. His first objection to the pending amendment is that it is not germane to the subject matter of the bill. Germane, of course, does not mean identical; it means related to or akin to. It may be a mere coincidence—but if so, it is a very striking coincidence—that all legislation relating to the hours of clerks in Washington has been incorporated upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

So far as I have been able to find, there is no legislation on that subject which has been incorporated upon any other bill. That may be a mere coincidence, and yet if so, it is a very striking coincidence upon the point of order whether or not the hours of labor are germane to a bill appropriating for the pay of the employees of that class and character. But the gentleman has overlooked a more recent decision expressly upon the point of germaneness and expressly upon the application of the Holman rule.

Not very long ago the one now addressing you offered an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia providing for a change in the method of assessing for street improvements. My amendment was that a portion of the street improvement should be assessed against the abutting property owner, and my contention was to that extent it relieved a charge upon the Federal Treasury. I offered it from the floor, so that it came, if at all, within the three excepted classes to the Holman rule—reducing the number of officers, reducing the compensation, or reducing the amount carried in the bill. Mr. HULL of Tennessee was in the chair at that time and decided that the amendment was not in order offered by a Member from the floor because it constituted substantive legislation that did not specifically reduce the amount carried in the bill, although it tended toward retrenchment, and therefore it was the class and character of an amendment which should come from a committee having legislative jurisdiction.

Thereupon the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] offered an amendment coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the point was then pressed with great earnestness that legislation of that character was not germane to the bill to which it was offered. Chairman HULL said:

> The Chair will also undertake to dispose of the other ground suggested by the gentleman from Illinois as to whether the effect of the proposed amendment would be a retrenchment of expenditures within the meaning of the rule. On the first question of germaneness the Chair is of opinion that if the amendment will retrench expenditures within the meaning of the rule, it will also be germane to the paragraph in the bill.

There was an amendment which went to change the organic law of the District of Columbia relating to the assessment for street improvement, and was held germane to an appropriation bill carrying appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia. Here is an amendment which seeks to regulate the hours of clerks, and it is offered to a bill which provides the appropriation by which those clerks are paid. And it would be very difficult to find a proposition which would be more nearly akin, related, or connected than a proposition regulating the hours of labor and conditions of employment attached to a bill which provided for an appropriation for the payment of that class of employees.

The gentleman makes the further point, but he does not seem to insist upon it with any confidence, that the amendment is not mandatory in its terms; that somebody might evade it by refusing to honestly enforce it; that nobody might exercise the power of reducing the number of clerks in the way the law points out. It is sufficient for us to say in this connection that the words of the amendment are mandatory. It says they "shall be" reduced, not "may be" reduced, or within the discretion of any official, but "shall be" reduced. The words themselves are mandatory words, and so recognized by law.

Now, I need only refer, then, to the last proposition of the gentleman on the question of the divisibility of the amendment. He has cited some precedents in this House, dating pretty far back, and the only one which nearly approaches the point which he makes is one on page 1392 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, in which an amendment was offered providing for the reduction of the number of clerks, and coupled with that a proposition to repeal a portion of the Bowman Act for the payment of claims against the Government.

Now, the Bowman Act was clearly not related to the proposition which was then before the House. I might attempt to introduce here a proposition reducing the number of clerks and couple with it a proposition to repeal the law for the acquirement of the reclamation sites, or the law for the government of the national parks, or any other law that I saw fit. That would not be germane. So the decision in that case was to the effect that simply by reducing the number of clerks and hitching with it a nonrelated proposition to repeal some law you could not bring the repeal of the law within the Holman rule. I take it that is true, although I do think that that decision goes to the extreme verge and has never been followed, so far as I know, from that day to this. I think it marks the outer boundary, because I think that case was on the twilight line of doubt as to whether or not the proposed amendment was divisible.

But assuming that that case was correctly decided, it is utterly unlike the case now before the Chair, for the case now before the Chair says that the time of certain clerks in the employment of the Government shall be eight hours instead of seven, and that the number of clerks shall be reduced 10 per cent.

Now, it is utterly impossible to separate those two propositions. As a matter of common sense, if I say that I have a certain number of clerks in my employ, and I purpose to get along with a less number of clerks and work that less number of clerks an additional time, those two propositions are absolutely and inseparably united. I do not say that I am going to reduce the number of clerks and leave the hours of labor the same, for I think the gentleman would attack that kind of a proposition with a great deal more energy than he would attack the proposition now before the House. But the two propositions are related and connected—that we reduce the number of clerks and change the hours of labor. And those two propositions are more nearly related—in fact, more inseparable, more impossible of division—than almost all of the precedents which have come before the Chair under the Holman rule.

I have seen precedents, and the occupant of the chair has also, where the proposed change in law was not nearly so fundamentally connected with the proposed reductcion in the appropriation as it is in this case. But here is a proposition which it is almost impossible to conceive a separation of. How would the gentleman separate them? You have a certan number of clerks working a certain number of hours, and you say you shall have a less number of clerks working a greater number of hours, so it is very difficult for the gentleman, it seems to me, to sustain his point that the proposition can be divided, or if divided, either part of it would not be germane to the proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a question; yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Even assuming that there may be some ground for the argument the gentleman is now making, will he further insist that the proviso is not separable from the balance of the amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman did not argue that proposition, but I will argue it with him.

Mr. MONDELL. I did argue it.

Mr. BORLAND. I will refer to that, because the proviso is also an integral part of the amendment. The Chair is well aware of the existing law, or must have in mind the existing law, that certain departments here maintain now an eight-hour schedule. Those departments are the mechanical departments of the Government—the ordnance factory at the navy yard, the bureau of public printing, and so on. The very purpose of this act being to equalize the hours of labor and to put the men who are now upon the seven-hour basis upon an equality with the men upon the eight-hour basis, the proviso excepting those departments which are now operating under an eight-hour basis is an integral and necessary part of the law itself. And I contend it is germane. In fact, I contend it is an inseparable part of the proposition, viewed from the standpoint of the pending law.

Mr. Chairman, the Holman rule, as I said before, is a remedial proposition, intended to permit actual, real reduction and retrenchment. And it must be given construction based upon that conception of the rule. Here is a proposition which permits actual reduction in the expenditures of the Federal Government, and I contend that it is fully within the letter and spirit of the Holman rule. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin on the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, an original question, as I view it, is presented to the Chair for decision since the revival of the Holman rule. No ruling has been made since the Holman rule was revived that bears directly on the question before the Chair for decision, other than the decision referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], the decision by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], passing upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, offered by him without committee sanction, was in order.

Chairman HULL ruled that that amendment was not within the province of any Member on the floor to present; that it was within the province of a committee to report, not under that part of the Holman rule upon which the gentleman is now seeking to hang his present amendment, but on that portion of the rule which holds that a committee which has authority to legislate may bring in amendments reducing expenditures.

I call the attention of the Chair to the decision, as printed on page 498 of the Manual, in which Chairman HULL there tersely justifies the amendment being reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia as in order under that provision. I take it that you can not accomplish by indirection what you can not accomplish by direction, and that the Chair in deciding whether this amendment is in order will construe the full purpose of the entire Holman amendment, and will not set aside one provision of the Holman rule that relates to legislation being in order when reported from a committee having that in their jurisdiction, and thereby not give effect to that provisions by trying to bring it in under some other part of the rule.

There is no question in my mind but that this amendment is divisible and that one part of the amendment is in order under the Holman rule and another part of the amendment is not in order, because it is not reported from a committee that has jurisdiction over the subject matter. If the Committee on Appropriations had jurisdiction to legislate as to the hours of labor of these employees, and the committee had so reported a provision such as that offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], then I would contend that it was in order. But when the gentleman joins with his amendment a distinct substantive proposition which it is not within the province of the Committee on Appropriations to report, and which by itself would be clearly subject to a point of order, he can not make it in order by joining it to a provision merely reducing expenditures.

The Chair can see what an absurd condition would follow from such a holding. It would be in order for any Member of the House in the consideration of this bill to reduce the amount of an appropriation for any bureau and then provide, for example, that the work of the bureau chief should be performed by some other bureau chief, which would be direct legislation over which the Committee on Appropriations would have no authority.

Furthermore, I wish to call the Chairman's attention to the fact that it is not germane. The reading of this amendment extends to all the clerks in the District of Columbia and to all the departmental service, whereas this bill does not propose to provide the salaries of all the clerks. There is no provision in this bill for the clerks in the Agricultural Department, for instance, or in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Further, I direct the Chairman's attention to the fact that when we were considering the bill relating to the Pension Bureau we placed there a limitation similar to this that referred only to the Bureau of Pensions. And yet if this is now considered to be in order it would supersede that provision, which restricts the number of appointments that would be made in the next fiscal year in the Pension Bureau. It comes too late.

But I wish to lay special stress upon the fact that the decision cited by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], which is referred to in the Manual on page 352, back in the Fifty-second Congress, is directly in point. There it was attempted to reduce by one employee the number provided in the bill and join that with a substantive provision of law over which the committee had no jurisdiction, and the Chair held that could not be done.

Supposing the Chair holds this provision to be in order. Any Member may demand a division of it. The House may vote up the provision reducing the number of employees and the other provision may be voted down. But when you have two substantive propositions submitted in one amendment, one being in order and one not being in order—one not being in order because the committee reporting it has not the legislative authority to report that substantive legislation—then I say the Chairman should hold, in order to give full effect to all the provisions of the Holman rule, that it is not in order. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MONDELL. One moment. I want to call the Chair's attention to the parallel between the ruling in the Fifty-second Congress, February 9, by Mr. Richardson, the case then presented, and the amendment now before us. In that case, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has just stated, the proposition was to reduce the number of clerks and joined with it a provision, just as in this case, to perfect an arrangement under which it was hoped that the services of the clerks dispensed with would not be needed. In that case it was proposed to reduce the number of the clerks in the Court of Claims by one, and then relieve the Court of Claims of a considerable part of its burden of business.

In this case it is proposed to reduce the number of clerks and to provide for the performance of the work by other clerks by increasing the hours of service. The two cases are on all fours. They are similar in every respect. In that case the author of the Holman rule took part in the debate, and the decision was rendered by one of the best parliamentarians who has occupied a seat in this House. His decision was that the subject was divisible, and therefore subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers an amendment to be known as section 6 of the bill, the amendment providing:

That the number of persons in the classified service authorized to be employed in the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia shall be reduced by one-tenth on or before the 30th day of June, 1917, and in order that such reduction may be made without loss of service to the Government and to equalize the hours of work required of those in the classified employments of the United States it is made the duty of heads of the several executive departments and other executive establishments and the government of the District of Columbia to hereafter require, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1899, approved March 15, 1898, not less than eight hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the classified employees of those branches of the public service in which such employees are now required to work eight hours a day.

To the amendment the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] makes the point of order that it is legislation, that it changes existing law, and therefore is not in order on an appropriation bill.

While it is true, under the general rules of the House, that legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill, under the rules of the present House there is an exception to that general rule, the exception being that an individual Member of this House can offer amendments providing for legislation on an appropriation bill if such amendments are germane to the bill and retrench expenditures of the Government in either of the following three methods: By the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, or by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill. The individual Member, and nonlegislating committees on all fours with individual Members, can propose germane legislation to an appropriation bill if it falls within either of those three excepted classes.

The Holman rule provides an additional method of legislating on an appropriation bill. The proviso to clause 2 of Rule XXI provides that legislation the natural consequence of which is to retrench expenditures is in order if it is proposed by a committee of the House having jurisdiction of the legislative subject of the amendment, or by a joint commission, or the House members of a joint commission authorized to deal with that legislative subject.

The proponent of the amendment in question contends that while it is legislation it is in order, because he contends that it falls within one of the excepted classes permitting an indivdual Member of the House to offer germane legislation. The proponent of the amendment contends that it reduces the number of officers whose salaries are paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The question, therefore, for the Chair to pass upon is to determine, first, if the amendment is germane; second, if it comes within one of the excepted classes; and, third, if the legislative part of the amendment is connected up with the proposition to reduce the number of salaries or officers paid out of the Treasury of the United States under which it is claimed the legislation is in order.

The bill before the House is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, dealing generally with the salaries of officers and employees of the United States Government. The Chair is cognizant of the fact that there are some exceptions to that, notably the Agricultural Department, but in the main it is the appropriation bill which carries the salaries for the officers and employees of the Government. The amendment seeks to deal with a certain number of the employees of the Government, and the Chair thinks the amendment proposing a new section dealing with a certain class of Government employees is germane to the bill.

Now, the question arises whether the amendment of itself does reduce the number of officers paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment must show on its face that it does perform one of the functions required under the rule to make it in order. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the language of the amendment using the word "shall" makes it mandatory upon the heads of the departments on or before June 30, 1917, to reduce the number of employees in their departments one-tenth, unless they are relieved of that duty by the proviso of the amendment. The amendment clearly reduces the salaries to be paid out of the United States Treasury, one of the exceptions under the rule authorizing legislation on an appropriation bill.

Now, the question arises, on the point of order made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], whether or not the amendment is divisible. The gentleman from Wyoming contends that if the first part of the amendment, reducing the number of clerks, is in order the last, or legislative part, is in no way connected with it and it is not in order. It is undoubtedly in order under the rules of the House to reduce the number of employees, or to move to strike out the number of employees, without the Holman rule. And the object of the Holman rule, as the Chair understands it, is to permit germane legislation under certain conditions.

Now, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that where an amendment is offered reducing the number of salaries paid out of the Treasury, coupled with legislation, that legislation, to be in order, must be connected up with or related to or logically follow from the part of the amendment reducing the number of employees or the amounts of money covered by the bill, and so forth.

The Chair had the pleasure of being here when the rulings referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] were made, and the Chair has the greatest respect for the opinions of those who participated in that ruling; but the principal precedent cited is the one where an amendment proposed to reduce by one the number of clerks in the Court of Claims, coupled with a legislative provision repealing an act of Congress known as the Bowman Act. The Chair does not think that to reduce one clerk in the Court of Claims is in any way germane or connected with or that it logically follows or has any connection with the repeal of the Bowman Act.

Now, what does the amendment in question do? It provides that one-tenth of the employees of the various executive departments shall be discharged or reduced. The legislative part of the amendment provides that when this reduction is made the remaining clerks shall work eight hours instead of seven. The Chair can not escape the conclusion that if you reduce the number of clerks the business of the Government will require those remaining in the service to work longer hours. The Chair thinks the legislation naturally and logically follows the provision reducing the number of clerks.

Now, the Chair, as before stated, believes the Holman rule is intended to have a beneficial effect upon the Treasury of the United States. If the Chair is in doubt about whether or not an amendment is in order, he believes it is his duty to resolve that doubt against the point of order, for by so doing the Chair works no hardship upon anyone, but submits to the committee itself the privilege of passing upon the amendment. If the committee favor it, a majority can adopt it. If they are opposed to it, a majority can reject it.

The Chair believes the amendment in question comes clearly within the spirit of the Holman rule, and therefore the Chair, without any reference whatever to the merits of the proposition, overrules the point of order and holds the amendment in order. The Chair cites the following authorities in support of this ruling, namely, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-second Congress, first session, pages 4909–4920; Fifty-second Congress, second session, page 1690. Ruling by Hon. W. L. Wilson, of West Virginia, in Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 3887. Ruling by Chairman Lester, Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 3891. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been discussed pro and con in the newspapers, in the cloakrooms, on the floor, and elsewhere. I am quite sure that every Member of the House is prepared to vote upon it now. There is much important legislation pending. It is expected that an important bill will be called up as soon as this one is disposed of, and I would like to see if we can not agree upon a limit of time for debate on the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. From the number of Members on this side who have requested time we shall require some time on this side.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I should think 40 minutes on a side would be ample to discuss the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. I should think we ought to have at least an hour and a half.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me 30 minutes on a side ought to be ample.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the gentleman thinks 30 minutes on his side will be ample, because he will probably occupy the 30 minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman offering the amendment has the laboring oar.

Mr. MANN. There has been enough agitation of this subject. It ought to be discussed and disposed of once for all.

Mr. BORLAND. If the affirmative of the proposition can get along with 30 minutes, the opponents of the proposition ought to be satisfied with that.

Mr. MANN. The affirmative could not get along with 30 minutes if they could get anyone to favor the proposition.

Mr. BORLAND. I assure the gentleman there will be somebody favoring the proposition.

Mr. MANN. There will be one gentleman, and that is the author of the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that we let the debate run along for a while.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it will be better to fix the time in advance, if we can agree upon it. What does the gentleman say to an hour?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that, from the demands for time, I do not see how this side can get along with less than an hour and a half.

Mr. MANN. Why, it will take nearly that time to read the answers to the letters sent out by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, who has tried to work his campaign in advance.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Missouri is not the only man that has worked upon it in advance.

Mr. MANN. I have not seen anybody else.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Missouri is not the only one that has indulged in literary effort.

Mr. MANN. I have not seen any.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman can not read, then.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What does the gentleman from Iowa suggest—what does he say to an hour and a half?

Mr. MANN. On each side?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; for the full discussion.

Mr. MANN. That is just what the gentleman first proposed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I proposed at first 40 minutes for a full discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto be closed in an hour and a half.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit another request for unanimous consent, and that is that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in two hours.

Mr. GOOD. I think we ought to get through in two hours, but there is a real demand on this side for 1 hour and 15 minutes. I have requested some gentlemen who asked for 10 minutes to take only 5. Some gentlemen from that side of the House come over here and demand time from us because they are against the proposition. The gentleman must know that there are 15,000 clerks who are very much interested in this, and we ought to discuss the matter to some extent. The committee never discussed it, and I suggest that the gentleman make it two hours and a half.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. According to the gentleman's own statement he can get along with an hour. I want to say that all of the hour may not be taken up on this side by those who are in favor of the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Let me say to the gentleman that there will be no disposition on this side to prolong discussion beyond a legitimate discussion by those who want to talk.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, here is a matter, as the gentleman from Iowa says, affecting 15,000 people, while as a matter of fact it affects 30,000 people in the District of Columbia——

Mr. BORLAND. And a hundred million people in the United States.

Mr. MANN. And it affects very materially the Treasury of the United States. The gentleman proposes to limit debate to an hour on a side. Why, we spend more time than that frequently on a 5-cent proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But we want to dispose of the public business instead of listening to idle, useless talk.

Mr. MANN. It may be useless. If the proposition had not come before the committee after a vote in the Committee on Appropriations, with practically the unanimous solid support of the Committee on Appropriations, it would not have received any consideration at all. If gentlemen want to admit that they have given it all up, say so; but if it is to be considered on its merits it is worth discussing it on its merits.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Two hours is a very considerable time for discussion.

Mr. MANN. I should say that two hours was a very little time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The matter has been discussed several days.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I give notice that I am going to move to limit debate after a reasonable time.

Mr. FOSTER. And I give notice that I shall object to any extension of time.

Mr. MANN. I consider two hours an utterly unfair proposition.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee that he is going to close debate when he gets ready, I object. No favors in a fair field.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman seems to be attempting to run over us.

Mr. MANN. We are threatened that the gentleman is going to run over us.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submitted a fair proposition for two hours' debate, for one hour on a side. This bill has been pending for two weeks, and this matter has been discussed pro and con ever since it was first proposed.

Mr. MANN. I have been here continuously, and I have not heard any discussion on it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not mean on the floor of the House, but I mean in the newspapers and outside.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that if we can have an hour and 15 minutes on this side that it will be satisfactory. I am compelled to yield time to gentlemen on that side who want to speak against the amendment. If the gentleman on that side only wants 1 hour, then we can limit debate to 2 hours and 15 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in two hours and a half, 1 hour and 15 minutes to be controlled by me and 1 hour and 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in two hours and a half, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to control 1 hour and 15 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to control 1 hour and 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That can not be done in committee.

The CHAIRHAN. The committee can grant leave to extend remarks to one individual, but can not grant it generally.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether I can get 10 minutes on this matter. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Each side ought to give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield him five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this proposition is one to provide a standard working day of eight hours for the Government departments in the city of Washington and for the government of the District of Columbia. There are approximately 34,000 employees in the city of Washington in the classified Government service. There are some 466,000 employees in the classified service throughout the United States. It thus appears that about 7 per cent of the classified employees are in the District of Columbia and the remaining 93 per cent are elsewhere in the United States. Of the 34,000 that are in the District of Columbia, about 7,000 of them now work eight hours a day. That includes those men in the mechanical trades, as, for instance, in the Government Printing Office, where there are about 4,000 employees, of whom 3,600 work eight hours a day and 400, being clerks, work seven hours a day. Throughout the United States the great bulk of the Federal employees are employees in the Postal Service. Close to 200,000 of the total employees are in that service. In 1910 we secured for those men an eight-hour day. At that time they were working 9, 10, and 11 hours in the large post offices of the country, and in certain cases a majority of them were working on Sundays and holidays.

The purpose of this law is simply to do what any honest business man in this room or elsewhere would do when in control of his own business, namely, to require a standard, usual, and customary business day from his employees. If any man in this House were elected general manager by the stockholders of a large corporation and empowered to spend the money of that corporation, and he required less than a full day's work of his employees, he would feel that he was not doing justice to the stockholders whom he represented. If he required more than an honest day's work, he would feel that he was not doing justice to the employees over whom he was placed. He would know that there was an honest, a customary, and usual business day, and that he ought to demand it of his employees. Why this discrimination between the great bulk of the employees of the Federal Government and a small section of them here in Washington? The reason for that, of course, traces back to political favoritism.

The first act that we have governing the labor of employees of the Federal Government was the act of 1874, and it will astonish some Members of the House when I tell them what it provides. It provides that the hours of labor shall not be less than 8 hours in the offices here during certain months of the year, and not less than 10 hours during the remaining months of the year. That was the original act governing the employment of clerks in this District. At that time the Federal Government was spending less than $100,000,000 for its total expenses—less than one-tenth of what it is now spending. That law which provides for an 8 and 10 hour day and which says it should not be less than an 8 or 10 hour day seems to have been honored more in the breach than in the observance, because we find in 1893 a provision that heads of departments here shall require not less than 7 hours a day. Evidently it had become the general practice of the Government to require less than 7 hours, and it was necessary to pass a mandatory statute forbidding the heads of the departments to require less than 7 hours a day. That was the shameful condition of the public service in 1893. Unfortunately that law did not reach the evil. That law provided that in certain cases, upon certain reasons, the head of a department could either "limit or extend" the hours of service, and it seems that in all cases he used his power to "limit" the hours of service and in no single case did he use it to "extend" the hours of service.

When we came to the crisis of the War with Spain, in 1898, when we wanted the services of these men, it was necessary to pass an amendment to that law and to take away from the heads of the departments and the chief clerks the right to "limit" the hours of service; and so the whole fight here has been not to cut down the day to the standard working day, as is now the fight carried on by organized labor throughout the United States—a glorious fight which they have not yet won—it is not to cut down the hours of labor to the normal day, but to find some way by the representatives of the people to force the executive clerks of these departments to observe an honest business day in the interest of the taxpayer. We had to take away the right to limit the hours of service. That is the last amendment upon the subject. In 1898, when the Government was under the strain of war, they lost, as they ought to have lost, the right to cut down the hours of service below seven hours. Since that time we have more than doubled the employees in the classified service. The activities of the Government are growing daily. Every year some new activity comes into existence, and this evil, this discrimination, becomes more pronounced. In the Public Health Service throughout the country the employees are working 10 to 14 hours, and in Washington they are working 7, and the same discrimination exists in every branch of the Federal service.

It has frequently been stated that the only objection some men have to this law is that it does not say that nobody shall work more than eight hours. The whole history of the legislation shows that it never was designed or intended, nor was it ever necessary, to legislate to the effect that nobody in the Government service should work more than eight hours in the city of Washington. When we got outside of the city of Washington we had to say that the Government clerks in the post offices should not be required to work more than eight hours except under certain circumstances, but here in the city of Washington we have to provide the other way—that they shall not work less than a specified number of hours, which we determine. Gentlemen can not shield themselves behind that kind of a technicality from voting for the law in the interest of the taxpayer. They can not get behind the wording of this law, because they are confronted face to face with the history of the law itself, which has compelled Congress by a strong hand to stay the hand of greed upon the taxpayers' Treasury of the United States.

Gentlemen know that eight hours at least is a business day in the commercial cities of the country. Why should it be less in the city of Washington? Every year as we increase the activities of Government, we bring thousands of business men here who must do business with these departments. They can not go there at the usual hours in the morning that they would go to any other place of business and be served. They will find nobody to serve them. They can not go there in the later hours of the afternoon when they would be employing their time profitably in the commercial cities from which they come, for they will find nobody there willing to give them attention. A Member of Congress can not take his constituents to a department in the late afternoon, but he must leave here in the midst of a session of Congress and hurry down to the departments before the clerks have slammed their desks and gone home, or he must send his constituents back to their hotel, to stay there another day at their own expense, in order to transact public business with the departments of the Government.

If there is any one complaint that is general and widespread throughout this country it is the mass of detail, red tape, and delay in doing business with a department at Washington. The man who votes to-day against this amendment votes to perpetuate that abuse; votes to put upon the taxpayers of the Nation not only the added expense but also the added inconvenience of a short, and unnecessarily short, business day in this city. Why, it is always a matter of surprise——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, it is always a matter of surprise to business men who come here to find how difficult it is to get any matter transacted before a department; how much trouble and delay is necessary for the most insignificant and simple matter. All of you gentlemen who vote against the proposition will have ample opportunity in coming years to explain to your constituents why you will perpetuate that kind of abuse.

Now, I will take up the position of organized labor on this subject. Organized labor has made, and, I am glad to say, with my help and yours, a glorious fight for the eight-hour day. It is a fight on principle; it is a fight that says, here is an honest working day, here is a day that represents an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. In that organized labor has had the sympathy and support of thousands of men, and to-day organized labor is still engaged in that fight. Godspeed them in that fight. I am with them. I was with them for the postal employees; I am with them for the men who work on Government contracts; I am with them all down the line. Godspeed them in the eight-hour day. And here they are sending out literature broadcast throughout the country, "Eight hours work, eight hours sleep, eight hours free time." I am going to send this around among Members of the House. This is the slogan of organized labor. If organized labor departs from that and attempts to make a discrimination, then the explanation is upon the officers of organized labor who are attempting that discrimination, not upon those who regard that as the slogan, and the true slogan, of organized labor. Now, it is not surprising, you know, that opposition would come to this proposition from the Washington press, representing, as it does, the financial and commercial interests of Washington. It is perfectly manifest that if you work your employees less than a full day you must have more employees. More employees mean more groceries, more dry goods, more amusements, more house rent, more everything. The whole commercial interests of Washington are on one side of this proposition, and the entire taxpayers of the Nation are on the other side of the proposition. You have to have more men, more families, here, and the commercial interests have more people to feed. Uncle Sam's pay roll in the District of Columbia is approximately $50,000,000 a year. If you would save 10 per cent of it, as you undoubtedly can, by enforcing an honest business day, that would mean $5,000,000 out of the pockets of the financial interests of the District of Columbia, because they get almost every dollar you pay out. The opposition, therefore, is primarily for the benefit of the clerks, a favorite class, but ultimately and really it is for the benefit of the landlords and merchants of the city of Washington. Let no man forget the real issue in this case.

If any man did overlook the real issue, the papers of Washington would remind him of it, because their daily statement of the commercial interests shows that that is the case. Also they sell houses on the installment plan to these clerks, and the more clerks that are brought here, the more houses are bought, and the clerks are good risks. They work for an employer who never goes out of business, who never has a strike, a lockout, or boycott, an employer who is never affected by business depression or hard times, an employer who never closes down his establishment, and so an employee on his pay roll is a very good risk. Gentlemen are aware that we have to rent office space for these additional employees of the Government. It takes more office space for a large number of men working a short time than for a small number working a full day, and you have the shameful condition like they are down here, where we are paying $36,000 for quarters now occupied by the Attorney General. Thirty-six thousand dollars a year for the quarters now occupied by the Attorney General! Why, every dollar paid to private landowners in the District of Columbia for additional space for these additional employees would house more activities in our own buildings, and every dollar saved would be saved from what is paid to the land speculator; and then you wonder that these people move heaven and earth and even get men in this House worked up to the point of taking the high moral position that nobody must lengthen the hours of labor in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the first and, it seems to me, conclusive objection to this amendment relates to the manner of its presentation. A matter of this importance, affecting very greatly a large number of people, should be considered in the way provided by the rules of the House—should be presented to the proper committee, hearings should be held, and careful consideration should be given to all the effects of the change proposed. In due time the committee would report its recommendations to the House, whereupon the House could discuss the matter, with all the information obtained from the hearings and discussion in the committee, and arrive at an intelligent conclusion. If this were simply and solely a question relative to the proper number of hours of service of Federal Clerks, then there might be some ground for a division of opinion. If it were a new matter—if we were just establishing a Federal city, if conditions had not been crystallized, and we were called upon to say how long clerks should labor in the Federal departments, how many hours of labor they should give to the Government—we might have differences of opinion on that subject. But that is not the question presented. The first and most important question presented is that of a reduction of the number of clerks in the Federal employ by 10 per cent. I am certain that there is not a Member of the House acquainted with the public business but knows it would be utterly impossible, be destructive of public interest, be harmful beyond measure to reduce the number of clerks in the Federal departments by 10 per cent, as proposed by this amendment. For instance, consider the clerks provided for by this bill. The committee spent many days carefully studying the needs of the various branches of the Government service, providing with care for the actual number deemed necessary for each of the separate offices, bureaus, and departments. Along comes the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, proposing to destroy the symmetry of the work of the committee and bring confusion, disorder, and disaster to the public service by the radical reduction proposed..

It can not be done. Assuming that the remaining clerks might under certain conditions do all the work that is done by the larger number, public busjness is constantly increasing, we are constantly adding to the duties of the clerks in the departments, and we will add to those duties largely by legislation contained in the bills which will be passed in this Congress. It would be utterly impossible without very great harm to the public service to reduce the number of clerks as is proposed. More than that, this question of the hours of labor in the departments in the city of Washington is one that can not be considered without consideration of the conditions here existing. It was decided many years ago that the proper minimum number of hours for the clerks here is seven. The entire business and social life of the Capital has been developed and crystallized around the conditions established by seven hours of labor in the departments. To suddenly change all those conditions is to do a vast amount of harm, to do great injury, to bring confusion without, in all probability, accomplishing any good whatever. If any good could be accomplished by the increase of the number of hours of labor on the part of the clerks, that increase would be brought about by such a disarrangement of plans, habits, and conditions as they exist here as would work great hardship to the clerks and harm to the public service. Many of the clerks have bought their homes at a distance from the place of their labor. It may be said they should not have done that. But they have done it because the conditions were such as warranted them in doing it, and we have no business in disturbing the present plan or arrangements except on full and careful consideration. We are endeavoring to, so far as we may, reduce the hours of labor. Why, then, this sudden demand for an increase over the hours that have obtained for many years?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I followed carefully the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who is the proponent of this amendment, and I am wondering if he has abandoned the first proposition in the amendment. I heard him make but a single reference to his proposition to reduce the number of Government clerks one-tenth. I do not blame him. Such a proposition he knows would not be considered by this House for even the shadow of a moment on his say-so. And I suppose, in view of the fact that he has abandoned that proposition, we are to confine ourselves to a discussion of the other and weaker one of increasing the hours of freedom of Government clerks.

With the single exception of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], has anybody suggested or proposed this legislation? Is anybody in particular, in the country or in the District, to benefit by it? Do you believe that if adopted it will result in reduced expenditures of the people's money? Do you believe that the taxpayers, for whom the gentleman professes to plead, will be led into the belief that this proposed change will lighten their burden? For myself, permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that I stand for the adoption of legislation that will improve the condition of the working classes by reducing the hours of labor and increasing salaries where such increases are deserved. Economy, eh? Economy, what grand-stand plays are perpetrated in thy name! [Laughter.] And may I say to the gentleman from Missouri that this play of his is not worthy of the big league in which he is now performing? It is a bush-league performance. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, during my service in legislative halls I am proud to say that my time and energy have been devoted to reducing hours of employment and raising the scale of wages. And I propose to continue to work along those lines, because I believe that the real taxpayers in this country are the man and the woman who toils for a mere existence. Of course, my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has no confidence in the chiefs or the chief clerks of the departments; but some of us have. And these men here in Washington have declared against this proposed legislation, and, having known some of them in my brief career, I have been led to believe that if they thought there would be an increase in the work assigned to the clerks and a reduction in the expenditures of the Government, instead of condemning this proposition they would be unanimous in commending it.

I have here—but I am not going to take the time of the committee to read them—communications from practically every chief clerk in the departments in Washington. They all express the same opinion, that the adoption of an eight-hour law would not necessarily mean the discharge of a single clerk. Their opinion is good enough for me, Mr. Chairman, and, in my judgment, it is good enough for three-fourths of the Members of this House.

This amendment involves legislation utterly repugnant to all recent legislation of State and Nation, which recognizes the shortening of hours of labor as a fundamental principle of human welfare. [Applause.] If enacted it would result in a decrease of efficiency in the administrative machinery of the National Government, and in many instances it would cause a dislocation of work tantamount, in my judgment, to utter demoralization. It would work hardships upon thousands of patriotic, unselfish, hard-working employees of the Government without accomplishing any increase of efficiency or economy. It involves legislation directly and vitally affecting the economic and social life of 35,000 employees of the Government here in the District of Columbia. This proposal—and I would like to emphasize this point—this proposal has been the subject of no investigation by a competent body, but it comes before the House without consideration or discussion of any kind, and over the protests of the chairman of the subcommittee who is here in charge of the general bill which is occupying the attention of the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this proposed amendment is advanced as an application of the eight-hour working-day to the Government departments. It is not such application. In fact, it is a vicious and open attack upon the practice and the principle of the eight-hour day. No man who believes in the justice of an eight-hour workday can conscientiously support this proposition. It places no limit upon the workday. It merely places a limit upon the hours of freedom that Government clerks shall be permitted.

The eight-hour law, as we know it in the old Bay State, establishes a maximum eight-hour day, but this proposition establishes a minimum eight-hour day. It says that no clerk in the Government service here in Washington shall work less than eight hours. I do not know what the experience of the other Members of this House is, but I have found clerks, Mr. Chairman, who have worked 10 and 12 and 14 hours a day in Washington in times when public business had grown beyond the workday of the clerk, and for this overtime work none of these clerks had ever received a dollar of added compensation.

I repeat, we in Massachusetts have an eight-hour law which says that no man or woman shall work over eight hours a day, but this proposition says that no Government clerk shall work less than eight hours a day.

Oh, I heard the gentleman pay tribute to the Federation of Labor for the great work it has done in securing an eight-hour day throughout the country. Will the gentleman tell this House what the attitude of that organization is on this proposition? It has condemned this increase, Mr. Chairman, and it is firmly opposed to the proposition.

Fair play to these men and women who have no Representatives of their own in this House to plead their cause is all we ask.

The practical effect of enforcing an eight-hour minimum workday in the Government departments is to utterly repudiate the practice of an eight-hour workday. This summarizes the testimony of virtually all chief clerks of the Government departments. They are a unit in declaring that the practice, of necessity, will be to add the overtime not required so generally of Government clerks to a minimum workday of eight hours. As no compensation is provided for overtime, the effect of this would be to force upon the Government clerk a workday varying from 8 to 24 hours. Thus the United States Government would be forced to take the position that all legislation seeking to intercede in behalf of the employee in the interest of limited hours of labor is wrong; and all the accomplishments in the direction of ameliorating the conditions of labor in this country would be overturned, repudiated at the very fountainhead.

I do not believe that Congress will be a party to such repudiation.

Right here I want to read the opinion of the leading business organization in Washington—the chamber of commerce. The chamber has been making a careful investigation of this whole subject of hours of labor for Government clerks, and a special committee appointed from among its leading members filed a report which was unanimously adopted as the sense of this great business body. It is as follows:

FEBRUARY 29, 1916.

To the BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
Washington Chamber of Commerce.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned committee, appointed from the executive committee of the chamber to investigate and make report upon the pending legislation in Congress commonly called the Borland rider to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, respectfully report as follows:

The proposed legislation making provision for the payment of salaries to Government clerks in the District of Columbia dependent upon the condition that all such clerks should be required to work "not less than eight hours a day" is repugnant to recent legislation in both State and Nation upon the question of the hours of labor required by employers of labor, whether the employer be an individual, a company or corporation, a municipal, State, or the National Government. This is primarily true because the proposed eight-hour day as a minimum time of service for Government clerks is not only inconsistent with the eight-hour law provided by legislation as a maximum number of hours for a day's work, but defeats the just propositions involved in the eight-hour maximum day laws and upsets every principle of consideration to the laboring man or woman upon which those laws were based. Existing law, fixing eight hours as a maximum day's work, provides for additional work in cases of emergency upon the distinct basis that extra compensation shall be paid for each hour of service over and beyond the maximum eight-hour period. The Borland rider not only makes no such provision, but by fixing eight hours as a minimum leaves the Government free to work the clerks employed in the District of Columbia any length of time beyond the eight hours without any additional compensation. That fact makes it inconceivable to your committee how the Member of Congress who is the author of the proposition can defend it by a statement that its purpose is to correct "accidental privilege of discrimination now enjoyed by Government employees in the District of Columbia." On the contrary, the discrimination is, for the first time, proposed by the provision in reversing the present maximum period and making of it a minimum period applicable only to Government clerks employed in the District of Columbia.

Your committee feels that it is for that reason that the labor organizations of the country, without exception, have aligned themselves earnestly and ably in opposition to the proposed amendment. Always guardful, and properly so, of the interests, the rights, the health, and the opportunities in life of the members of labor organizations, those organizations are alert when legislation is proposed that would discriminate against them and their members, and in their present opposition to the proposed amendment the labor organizations show a commendable and an admirable degree of study and comprehension, in view of the fact that at first glance the proposition has the misleading and alluring appearance of preventing discrimination against the eight-hour laborer because Government clerks in the District of Columbia are required to work but seven hours. The author of the amendment stated to the chairman of your committee that he contemplated, as a result of the legislation, if enacted, a very material reduction in the force of employees now at work for the Government in the District of Columbia. Indeed, it is only because of his assertion that the provision would reduce expenses that the rider was allowed to be attached to the main bill, otherwise it would have been new legislation and not allowed under the rules of Congress.

Going into local phases of the proposition your committee does not share an indiscreet and unjust opinion, frequently expressed, that legislation by Congress, upon matters directly concerning the District of Columbia, is prompted by any ill feeling, prejudice, or wanton neglect of the interests of the District, but rather by lack of information on the part of Members of Congress as to the real local conditions peculiar to the District of Columbia and wholly unlike conditions prevailing "back home" where they came from in their congressional districts or in their States. In this connection it would seem that the author of this rider would have considered our local conditions before suggesting, as he did in his letter to a prominent labor leader, that the principal opposition to his rider comes from selfish local interests in Washington. That means that the opposition comes from the business men and the merchants of the city of Washington, who do business, in one form or another, with the 40,000 Government clerks in the District of Columbia. Your committee feels that such opposition to the rider as comes from the business men of Washington is simply an expression of enlightened self-protection. Excuse for resentment because of the opposition of the business men of Washington can only be found in the fact that in the States from which the Members of Congress come the Federal and States Government employees constitute, numerically, an inconsequential, almost negligible, portion of the community, whereas in Washington 40,000 Government clerks, with their families and those dependent upon them, make up the major source of revenue for the support and maintenance of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. Even in large cities like New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia the Federal employees, exclusive of the Postal Service, are limited to United States marshals and their deputies, collectors of internal revenue and their deputies, collectors of customs and their deputies, and United States district attorneys with their limited office force of employees. In any one of those large cities the aggregate number of Federal employees is so small as would make the business community appear ridiculous if it should ask for or object to legislation which would widen or curtail the privileges of those employees in the matter of observing the business hours of the community, either for their own convenience or in justice to the persons conducting business enterprises. As a matter of fact, however, no such inconvenience is experienced by Federal employees in the cities or in the States outside of the District of Columbia. There is no law upon the statute books which requires United States marshals, district attorneys, and collectors to work their clerks eight hours, and there is no hard and fast consecutive desk work required of the employees in those communities; they efficiently perform the duties at hand at such times and in such a way as the head of the particular office directs, whether it be 2 hours or 12 hours required in the performance of those duties. In the Federal offices and bureaus outside of the District of Columbia the hours of work are fixed either by regulation from the head of the department in Washington or by local custom in the respective communities or by the head of the office in the several cities or States throughout the country, and in every such instance Saturday half holidays and many local holidays are observed.

Your committee further suggests the unfairness of the proposed legislation in view of the fact that the Government clerks in the District of Columbia are practically helpless; that is, they have no vote and they have no representative in Congress, and more particularly, in this connection, they have no opportunity for effective protest such as is always open to the members of labor organizations who are not employed by the Federal Government and who can, at all times, refuse to work, unless stated conditions are complied with. With the Government clerks, if any number of them were to agree among themselves to resign, as the author of this rider kindly suggests, and if those resignations were in such numbers and from such places of employment as to block the wheels of the Government's machinery or impair the orderly conduct of its business, they could be tried for conspiracy against the Government and punished for their act. In fact, quite recently, a number of letter carriers in the State of West Virginia, dissatisfied with some action of their superior officers, resigned in a body and it was held that they were guilty of conspiracy in having conspired to upset if not stop the conduct of the Government's business, and a fine was imposed upon each one of them by the court.

And finally, your committee calls attention to the fact that during the administration immediately preceding the present one, the very question of the practicability of reducing the number of clerks was raised and the President appointed a committee of experts, men of wide experience both in governmental and in outside business affairs, and that committee went through every Government department in Washington making an investigation, the like of which has never been made in this District, their work consuming nearly three years of labor as a result of which they made many recommendations as to changes in method, in organization, and in detail, but made no suggestion whatever that there were more Government employees at work than were required for the performance of the duties incident to the public service here. And further in this connection, your committee regards it as most significant that there has not been found a division chief, section chief, deputy bureau chief, bureau chief, or head of a department in Washington who recommends the reduction of the clerical force or the increase of one hour of labor upon the clerks in their respective department.

We regard the rider, therefore, as an immature, impracticable, and unjust proposal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said a few moments ago that the chief clerks in the various departments were practically unanimous in opposing this change in the law. I have it from them personally. I would not have you believe even for a moment that I am offering hearsay evidence. I am going to read to you just what they think about this whole subject, but first may I call to your attention the opinion of Gen. Scott, of the War Department, who gave this statement to me for any and every use I could make of it?

WAR DEPARTMENT,
March 4, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your request for opinion as to whether or not the adoption of the Borland amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial bill would result in any reduction in the number of employees in this department, I beg to advise you that the various bureau chiefs of the department are unanimous in the opinion that the amendment in question would not result in any reduction in the number of employees in this department. I fully concur in the judgment thus expressed.

Sincerely, yours,

H. L. SCOTT,
Secretary of War ad interim.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF CLERK,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your letter of February 29 I beg to state that in my opinion the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill would not result in any reduction in the force of this department.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. C. HAVENNER, Chief Clerk.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
March 7, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 1st instant you are respectfully informed that we do not think the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill would result in any reduction in the number of employees of this commission.

Very truly, yours,

G. B. MCGINTY, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GALLIVAN: Replying to your letter of yesterday's date, received this morning, I am very firmly of the opinion that the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, requiring an eight-hour working day in the executive departments, would not result in any reduction in the number of employees required in the Department of State.

Very truly, yours,

BEN G. DAVIS, Chief Clerk.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF CLERK,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to the query propounded in your letter of the 29th ultimo, I have to advise that my best judgment is that the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill would not make possible any reduction in the number of employees in this department.

Very truly, yours,

ROBERT WATSON,
Chief Clerk.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF CHIEF CLERK,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GALLIVAN: Referring to your letter of February 29, in which you ask my opinion as to whether the adoption of the Borland amendment under the legislative, executive, and judicial bill will result in any reduction in the number of employees in this department, I have to advise you that it is difficult to give any definite opinion on the subject. It is not likely that there will be any reduction in the force in the event that the hours of labor are increased to eight per diem, because of the immense amount of work now devolving upon the scientific and clerical forces and the increasing demands upon them. It is possible, however, that a greater amount of work could be done by the existing force.

Very truly, yours,

R. M. REESE,
Chief Clerk.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GALLIVAN: I have your letter of the 29th ultimo, asking for my opinion as to whether the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill will result in any reduction in the number of employees in the Treasury Department.

I fail to see wherein the adoption of the said amendment will lead to any reduction in force in this department. The work of this department is so laid out that a great many of the employees are now actually engaged in work for more than eight hours. In some few cases clerks are able to finish in somewhat less than eight hours, and this is especially true as regards routine work. Treasury Department clerks and employees remain at their current work until it is finished, regardless of the number of hours involved. This sort of service is much to be preferred to a hard and fast rule of a service of so many hours. The eight-hour amendment, if adopted, would not make any improvement over present conditions.

Respectfully,

BYRON R. NEWTON,
Assistant Secretary.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF CLERK,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GALLIVAN: Replying to your letter of February 29, requesting an opinion as to whether or not the number of employees in this department may be reduced should the Borland amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial bill become a law, I will say frankly that I do not believe it would have very much effect in the direction indicated.

As you are no doubt aware, the Post Office Department has effected a considerable reduction in the number of employees within the last three years. This has been brought about through improved business methods and the elimination of the inefficient. It is obvious that from the natural growth of the service, the inauguration of the Parcel Post and Postal Savings System, the work of the Post Office Department has increased during this time, and therefore the handling of this enormous amount of clerical work could only have been accomplished through increased efficiency. As a result of the greater incentive to the younger employees of this department overtime service is the rule rather than the exception.

Very sincerely,

W. I. DENNING,
Chief Clerk.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF CLERK,
March 1, 1916.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GALLIVAN: Permit me to acknowledge your letter of the 29th ultimo, in which you request to be informed whether or not, in my opinion, the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill would result in any reduction in the number of employees in this department.

The Department of Justice is, perhaps, a little different in its organization from the other executive departments in that a larger percentage of its clerks are stenographers. The scheme of organization provides that one stenographer serve two attorneys, except, of course, the Solicitor General and the several Assistant Attorneys General, each of whom has a stenographer for his exclusive use. With few exceptions, all of the stenographers in the department now work over seven hours a day, and all of the stenographers of the Assistant Attorneys General work eight hours and over a day, so it can be seen that the adding of an hour to the lawful day's work can not possibly result in this department dispensing with any of its stenographic force, which is compelled to work overtime now to keep up.

In the division of accounts, the mail and files division, and the division of supplies there are about 45 employees, including the chiefs of these divisions. I do not believe that an hour a day added to the regular office hours could make it possible to effect a reduction in this force, because of the fact that during the busy seasons of the year many of these clerks work considerable overtime. What I mean by "busy seasons" is during the preparation of the estimates, the annual report of the Attorney General, and the preparation of special data for the information of Congress, aside from the regular work.

The subclerical force, consisting of 50 employees, not including charwomen, all, without exception, work eight hours and over a day. If the Borland amendment is adopted, they would have to work close to nine hours a day. We can not dispense with any of these people.

I believe, therefore, that I can positively answer your inquiry in the negative; the adoption of the Borland amendment in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill would result in no reduction in the number of employees in this department.

Sincerely, yours,

C. E. STEWART, Chief Clerk.

Mr. Chairman, there is the story. Here are the men who know. Are they to be believed? I think so, and I am certain you who have heard their opinions agree with them. Let us settle this question here and now. Let us by our votes overwhelmingly and for good bury this vicious proposal, which has already caused untold harm, and which never should have been brought into this discussion. Let the vote be so pronounced that it will be many, many years before such proposals ever again appear in these Halls.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend, revise, and correct my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the House is always entertained and generally edified by my likable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]. He always goes on the boards strong, and there is something about him that always enables him to get the results he goes after.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that a Member of Congress can do that will invite more adverse criticism of his course, there is nothing that he can do that will crucify him quicker, than to support the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. It takes a high order of courage to support it, and God knows it takes heroic courage to introduce and advocate such an amendment in this House. There are places in the United States of America where a man sometimes takes his life in his hands for taking chances along certain lines. Here is a man who is taking his political career, it seems to me, in his hands by fathering and pressing this amendment. Everything in an appropriation bill that must be spent in Washington is a crying necessity. Everything that is spent outside of Washington is classified all the way from "pork" to "graft." I hope, although I am hoping against all expectations, that this amendment may pass. But it has not a snowball's chance—we all know that—here. [Laughter.] You know when a snowball has no chance whatever. [Renewed laughter.]

But be that as it may, the situation has its serious phases. The time has come, the hour has struck, gentlemen, when something has to be done along the line of retrenchment in expenses. This Government of ours must face about, because we are confronted with the most serious conditions and situations that have confronted the Republic since the Revolutionary War.

The question of preparedness is a pressing necessity. I am for preparedness within well-guarded limitations and restrictions from the taxpayers' viewpoint as well as that of efficiency. I am not for a top-heavy Army and Navy; but here is the proposition that confronts us: We have been spending $100,000,000 annually for the Army and $150,000,000 annually for the Navy. We may have to double those figures. Now, you have to commence retrenchment somewhere, and you have to commence it in good faith, because you can not pile up half a billion dollars annually in appropriations for Army and Navy on the taxpayers of this country without hearing from them in no uncertain tones.

Here is a proposition that saves $5,000,000 annually. Now, in the few years I have been serving in Congress I have voted for propositions, that affect me personally, in the legislative appropriation bills that saved just as much as this amendment will save. Let us face this proposition fairly and squarely. There has to be, and must be, a lot of pruning out of these supernumeraries wherever they exist, wherever money can be saved. If a big Navy is an insurance policy for this Republic, let us have enough insurance. I am willing to bear my part of the premium.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. HELM. If a Navy twice as large as we now have is absolutely and essentially necessary to preserve this Republic and this Government, let us have it. If we must have a regular Army of 200,000 men, if that is necessary, let us have it. But let us commence trimming somewhere along the line in order that the back of the taxpayer may not be bent double, and let us distribute the premium on this insurance among the hundred millions of citizens of this Republic as equitably as it can be, placing the heaviest cost on the big rich. If the beginning place for this retrenchment is in the House of Representatives, let it come here. If it is in the Executive Department, let it go there. Let it be a horizontal, equitable reduction all along the line.

This amendment ought to be the beginning of a plan or type of retrenchment that this House ought to have the wisdom and the patriotism to carry into effect.

Let me mention to you a little matter perhaps not on all fours with this proposition, but as a Member of the Committee on Insular Affairs it comes to my knowledge that the Philippine government, being in need of funds—and bear in mind we claim that the Filipino is not fit for self-government—when the revenues were running behind, what did the Philippine Legislature do? They reduced the salaries of the government officials. Have we the courage; do we know enough about self-government to follow the example of the Filipinos that we say have not the capacity to govern their own islands?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I rise not with the intention of delivering an address upon the matter that is now before the House, but I do feel justified in imposing, as a new Member, upon the patience of this body to speak a word in behalf of the Government employee.

I desire to state that I am opposed to this amendment now under consideration.

Having twice been employed by the Government—once as clerk in the Capitol and later as assistant United States district attorney for the District of Columbia—and identified to a large extent with the interest of the working people of the city, especially those connected with the civil service, I believe that it is my duty—and it is certainly my pleasure—to speak a word in defense of the Government employees who reside both in the District and the State of Maryland. It is true that the position as assistant district attorney was particularly desirable and not strictly a Government job in the ordinary sense, as I was able to acquire valuable experience in the practice of my profession, but, nevertheless, in this attractive branch of the service I and my associates were obliged frequently to work at unreasonably long and irregular hours, receiving compensation which most of us did not believe to be commensurate with the services we were required to perform.

When a man accepts what is known as a permanent position in the civil service, particularly if he is a young man starting out in life, he can not resist the thought that the door of opportunity is closed against him. He abandons all hope of a public or successful business career, dedicates his efforts to the faithful performance of the duties assigned to him, and contents himself with the doubtful prospect of continued occupation. He is fortunate if he dies in the service, having faithfully performed his duties day by day without promotion in pay or rank up until the time of his death. On the contrary, he is an unfit, undesirable, inexperienced, and unqualified subject for work in the commercial world if, when he arrives at an appropriate age of retirement, he is, without charges of inefficiency, suddenly dropped from the rolls; and no provision is made or to be made by the Government for his future welfare. In the meantime he may have raised a family and perhaps built a little home in the District or somewhere in the suburbs of Washington or Maryland or Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the addition of an extra hour to the day's work of the employees will increase efficiency in the departmental service, especially since no measure has been introduced looking to a readjustment of salaries. If the statement is true—and it has not been denied—that there has been no readjustment of wages for the past 50 years or more in the Government to meet the high cost of living and other conditions, while in all other branches of industry salaries have been fixed according to the existing necessities of mankind, then the present status of the Government employee should be seriously considered.

Out in Maryland, on the other side of the District line, along the tracks of the Baltimore & Ohio, the Pennsylvania, and electric railroads between Washington and Baltimore, in the district which I have the honor to represent, hundreds of Government employees who have preferred to escape the high cost of living, other inconveniences of the city, and finally to establish for themselves a legal residence, for the enjoyment of the privilege of the right of suffrage, have built and purchased homes for themselves in localities where villages have grown and where lands have become valuable. In the majority of cases they have bought their homes on the plan of depositing a small amount in the beginning and applying monthly rental payments to the purchase price. Under the present seven-hour rule they can, by rising at an early but reasonable hour in the morning, come back and forth to and from the city over the railroads on commuters' tickets, arriving at 8.30, reporting to their offices promptly at 9 o'clock, and returning before darkness in the spring and summer of the year. If this eight-hour amendment is passed, it is apparent that great hardships will result, compelling the employee to rise in the morning and return to his home in the evening at unreasonable hours, and railroad schedules will have to be changed to meet these circumstances against the protest of other commuters who do not work in the Government, but are engaged in other pursuits. Certainly the railroad companies will not run an extra train at great loss within the half hour in order to accommodate both the Government employee and the business man. The result will be that the Government employee must dispose of his home and live in the city, but this will be impossible, because his property will have become practically valueless and undesirable to prospective buyers.

I believe that Congress should economize, but not at the expense of the workingman or the underpaid Government employee. [Applause.]

I wish to go on record as a friend of the workingman, and of those employed in the Government, whether they live in Maryland or the District of Columbia. As long as I am a Member of this House I will advocate and vote for any measure that has for its purpose a consistent increase in the pay of the Government employee where it is warranted, or the promotion of his welfare, comfort, and happiness when he arrives at an age where his services are no longer desired by his Government. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which provides that the Government clerks in the city of Washington shall work eight hours a day instead of seven hours per day, the time which they have been working for many years past.

I want to say that I am now, and have always been, a consistent friend of the laboring man, whether he works on the farm, in the mine, office, or mill, and I shall at all times vote and work for legislation that will be of lasting benefit to the man who earns his bread in the sweat of his face; but all other Government employees not in Washington work eight hours a day; the scale of all union organizations is eight hours per day, and the farmers and thousands of other laboring men in this country work from 10 to 12 hours a day, and none of them receive as much money in proportion to the work done as do the Government clerks in the city of Washington.

There are 312 working days in a year. The Government employees in the city of Washington get 30 days' sick leave of absence, 7 holidays, one-half holiday each on Christmas and New Year, one-half holiday on each Saturday for three months in a year, which are 6½ days, and 30 days' annual vacation, all with full pay, which means that the Government employees in the city of Washington labor only 237½ days in the year, and only seven hours each day, and receive pay for 312 full workdays. Is it fair to the other Government employees and laboring men throughout this country for the Government clerks to work only 7 hours a day and the rest of the laboring men work from 8 to 14 hours per day?

The Government employees in the city of Washington live in the most beautiful and cultured city in the world; the places where they labor are the most sanitary of any other laboring people, and they receive more wages for the work done than any others who labor; and now, because this Congress proposes to have them work eight hours per day, all who have the temerity to vote for this amendment must receive the criticism of the papers of the city of Washington. I want to say that the criticism in the Washington papers does not alarm me, and, in justice to the laboring people of my district, I shall support this amendment.

If this amendment carries, it means a saving to the Government of between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 per year. If it were an injustice to the Government employees I should cheerfully vote against it; but I can not conceive of it being a crime to have the Government employees of the city of Washington to work eight hours a day. There are thousands of men and women in my district and throughout the country, just as competent as the Government employees, who would be delighted to have the opportunity of taking these positions and working eight hours a day. There are thousands of good, patriotic miners and other laboring men of my district who work from 10 to 12 hours per day, through hot and cold, through sunshine and rain, through favorable and unfavorable circumstances and do not receive near as much for their labor as the Government employees in Washington. In justice to them, and in view of the fact if this amendment carries it will save the taxpayers of this country between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 annually, I feel I would not be true to the people of my district, who have so generously honored me, if I did not speak and vote for this wholesome amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT].

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, the question raised by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] involves infinitely more than whether a day's work by the Government employees in the Capital shall consist of eight hours instead of seven hours. That of itself is not a question of first magnitude. In fact, under ordinary conditions an eight-hour day is not too long. Most of the workers of this country work eight hours, or more, and an eight-hour day is my ideal, industrially speaking, and is the great goal for which the friends of labor have long battled.

But the question here raised is vastly deeper and more far-reaching. It is whether the long-battled-for advances of labor shall receive a setback at the hands of the American Congress; whether the representatives of the American people shall vote to stay the tide toward a just wage, reasonable hours, and sanitary working places; whether industrial democracy, the hope of the world for the cause of labor, shall again be deferred and wait for its birth on some new germ of life.

The history of the human race is marked by two great and unending struggles—the one for freedom of religion; the other for freedom of labor. After a struggle of thousands of years, marked by bloody footprints on the way, man is no longer stifled by the dogmas of creed or fettered by the chains of fanaticism, and labor is just beholding the dawn of a new and better day.

But this amendment is not only a blow at the cause of labor, it proposes herein the Nation's Capital a new and revolutionary order, carrying distraction and confusion into the governmental departments, the business houses, the shops, the schools, the boarding houses, and the homes.

But why are we called upon to take this backward step in the progress of labor, to cause this distraction in the affairs of the Nation's Capital? Merely because the gentleman from Missouri, in a spasm of economy, sees, dimly, as through a glass, a saving of $4,000,000, a saving that has no foundation except vague speculation, and no basis but a vivid imagination.

It is possible that I can speak with a little assurance as to proper hours and right conditions for governmental employees. I was for a long time at the head of one of the largest bureaus in one of our greatest departments of Government. I studied the life of the clerks and employees and entered into the spirit of their work. I endeavored to determine, as best I could, how long they should work each day in order to do justice to themselves and to the Government. If my experience taught me anything, it was that the best that an employee can do each day can be accomplished within a period of seven hours. It should be borne in mind that Government work is, in the main, of a character requiring more application of brain than of hand. Mental faculties do not renew so rapidly as physical faculties. Mind fag is more enervating than body fag. Seven hours of brisk, active, productive work is better than a longer period of dull, confused work. If the employee is properly directed, and his work is systematically arranged, he can readily accomplish his day's task in seven hours, and that should constitute his day's work. The case is not parallel with that of manual labor. Of course there is no question of the relative dignity of the two kinds of work. They are equally honorable.

I shall here notice a few of the contentions of the gentleman from Missouri. He has done me the honor to write me a letter, and he is a master letter writer.

In the first paragraph he says:

> The statement that salaries in the Government service have not been changed for 56 years is false. Every appropriation bill carries a number of increases and promotions and the work is constantly readjusted.

By the act of March 3, 1853, Congress made a classification of the Government positions and fixed the salaries for the various grades named in that act; and the salaries therein provided for, which are still applicable to the rank and file of the Government clerks to-day, have never been readjusted or increased for the grades named. The "increases and promotions" have been in the nature of new grades and increases in compensation for clerks above the average in salaries as carried by the first classification; so that it can not be maintained that the emoluments of the offices held by the usual run of clerks have been in any way changed, notwithstanding the cost of living on every hand has constantly increased.

Again he says:

> The statement that salaries are adjusted on a seven-hour day is false. Clerks are paid for a full day.

No fault can be found with this statement if it be understood in the light of actual facts, because, as a matter of fact, clerks are paid "for a full day," regardless of whether that day be of seven hours or more; but it is difficult to believe that the gentleman from Missouri would have that meaning accompany the statement. The act of March 15, 1898, specifically provides that the heads of the several executive departments shall—> require of all clerks and other employees * * * not less than seven hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared legal holidays by law or Executive order: Provided, That the heads of the departments may, by special order, further extend the hours of any clerk or employee in their departments, respectively; but in case of extension it shall be without additional compensation.

The minimum of seven hours allows no time for luncheon; and even that period is, in a very great many instances, extended without compensation in the way of money or extra leave to cover the overtime worked by the clerks.

The third paragraph of his letter contains the erroneous statement that—

> The clerks have 30 days' vacation, 30 days' sick leave, and all holidays. They work 238½ days out of the year, or less than 20 days a month. This is equivalent to only 208½ days of eight hours, or 17½ days a month.

In the first place, this statement assumes that every employee in the service gets full 30 days' sick leave in addition to 30 full days' annual leave; and that is not true, for in many instances employees are unable to receive the privilege of their full 30 days' annual leave and the majority of them do not have any sick leave during an entire year. The law—act of March 15, 1898—further vests in the heads of departments discretion to grant, first, 30 days' annual leave during each calendar year; and, second, they are clothed with the discretion to grant, in exceptional and meritorious cases, extension of leave on account of sickness, not to exceed 30 days in any one year.

Annual leave is granted in periods ranging from 30 minutes to 30 days, but no allowance is made for overtime work, notwithstanding such provision is made for certain employees of the Government outside of Washington.

In granting sick leave the head of at least one of the departments has, as I have heard, in violation of express law, adopted a scheme whereby clerks are penalized for taking the sick leave which the law says the department head may, in the exercise of his lawful discretion, hold that the clerks are entitled to receive. That rule or order provides that one point shall be deducted from a perfect grade for each day that a clerk is absent from work on annual and sick leave combined during a single year, or, in other words, if a clerk takes his full 30 days' annual leave and then 15 days sick leave his credit for attendance is reduced to 85, and his "efficiency" record is correspondingly affected, regardless of the years he may have worked hard and faithfully prior to being overtaken by misfortune.

Many exceptions could be taken to the gentleman's fourth statement to the effect that employees outside of Washington have only 15 days' leave and many of them work Sundays and holidays. Legislation was but recently passed providing more leave for postal employees outside of this city, and when it is remembered that railway postal clerks are not actually on duty more than half the time he is radically wrong in that statement.

The reference to "the complaining 7 per cent" might be passed without notice, had not the gentleman added that "the other 93 per cent work and ask no favors," for in the latter words is found the greatest error of all. The author of the statement has apparently forgotten the many petitions to Congress by the organized Government workers, namely, the railway postal clerks, the rural mail carriers, and the Government machinists, all of which is quite proper. These classes of Government employees have evidently acted upon the "enabling" act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, and it seems they have brought about a recognition of their demands, and I am glad of it.

The fact remains that the salaries of the rank and file of Government clerks have not been changed since they were fixed in 1853, and many clerks receiving those salaries to-day are doing the higher classes of work, while others paid the higher salaries perform the lighter duties. This is true, in many instances, because of the failure to provide some humane way to relieve the service of old and infirm clerks who have devoted their best years to the work.

To add another hour to the day would effect no real saving; certainly not enough to offset the powerful wrong that would be done to the cause of labor and the confusion that would result to the general public in the Nation's Capital. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not because I am not interested in labor that I am supporting and shall vote for the Borland amendment. It is not because there are no laborers in my district that I shall vote for this amendment. Some of the largest industrial institutions in my State are within my district, and the laboring men of those institutions are my friends, and in some places have supported me regardless of their political affiliations. But the question that appeals to me here is why—and I would like to have some gentleman answer this question—why 7 per cent of the Government employees should be made the beneficiaries of special legislation or special rules in the Government departments? Why should 7 per cent of them work seven hours a day and 93 per cent, in positions that are equally as confining and laborious as the seven-hour positions, work eight hours a day?

What reason can anyone assign for this discrimination? Everyone knows that the work in the Government Printing Office and in the navy yard is just as hard as the work in any other department, yet the employees in those branches of the service have to work eight hours a day. Let us take the Post Office Department. Its employees here in Washington work seven hours a day, yet when a postmaster or a clerk is appointed in any other office, either in the country, the small towns or the large cities, a list of questions is first submitted to him that he must answer to the satisfaction of the department, and one of those questions is, "Will you give at least eight hours a day to the duties of the position to be filled?" Yet these blanks are prepared and sent forward by clerks who work seven hours a day under more favorable conditions and surrounded with greater conveniences than can be had in most any office in any other part of the country; and the clerks and other employees in the United States Customs Service, the Internal-Revenue Service, and the Reclamation Service of the entire country are instructed to work eight hours a day, and these instructions are edited and sent forward from their respective departments here in Washington by clerks who work only seven hours a day. Ah, gentlemen, you can not square your records with the clerks in these various branches of the service outside of Washington, by voting to continue a special favor to a favorite few here in Washington. I want to ask you gentlemen who are opposing this amendment how you are going to explain your attitude and your vote to those Government employees of your district who do not happen to be located in Washington, and many of whom are working more than eight hours a day; and how are you going to explain it to men employed by private industry, such as interstate carriers over which Congress has partial jurisdiction. That class have never been the beneficaries of special favors at your hands. How are you going to explain to them why you favor special favors to a part of the clerks in Washington, and how are you going to explain to the other clerks here in Washington and to their friends back home why you would have them work eight hours alongside their neighbors, who are working only seven hours, at no harder tasks; and how are you going to explain to the taxpayers of the country, from whose pockets are extorted $4,600,000 annually to supply the deficit in the labor of these departments by reason of this special favor to this particular lot of clerks; and, further still, how are you going to explain your course to the hundreds of applicants of your districts who are applying to the Government for positions in the departments at Washington, and are beseeching you on every hand to assist them in their efforts, and who would be glad, indeed, to secure such a position with an eight-hour day, because every mother's son of them is now working more than eight hours a day, and because the position sought here pays a better salary than they can ordinarily command in other places, and because conditions under which the clerks labor here in Washington are the most favorable and the surroundings under which they live are the most pleasant in the country? And, Mr. Chairman, I am wondering how the opponents of this amendment are going to explain their opposition when they meet other clerks and laborers who work 8 to 10 hours a day, and some of them longer.

I am for the Borland amendment because it stands for justice and equity and against special favoritism among the employees in the ranks of labor, and I challenge any man to show where my stand is unfriendly to labor or that my course has ever been against its best interests, for everyone who knows me or who is familiar with my record in both public and private life knows that I am a friend to and interested in the laboring men of my district and the country. During my five years' service in this House I have used my influence and cast my vote in the interest of labor at every opportunity, and on every measure designed to better the conditions of the laboring people; and the laboring classes of my district, which constitute a large element of my constituency, have shown their appreciation of my course by the support which they have given me in former campaigns, for many of them have supported me regardless of their political affiliations.

The laboring people, through their organizations, have fought for an eight-hour working day, and I have supported them as far as it was possible for the Congress to go, and I challenge any man, in Congress or out of Congress, to point to a single instance wherein I have failed to give my support to any measure or any movement the object of which was to make an eight-hour day, for which labor has been asking, or in any way to better the conditions under which the laboring people must live. I have not stopped at supporting and voting for every bill designed to benefit labor, but I have performed a further duty to the laboring millions by studying carefully each bill which purported to be in the interest of labor, in an effort to guard against deception which sometimes finds its way into legislation and which, if not eliminated, would destroy the very purpose for which the legislation was intended, and not only do that, but also place additional burdens upon those whose burdens the law is supposedly intended to lighten. I particularly recall one case of that kind which occurred in this House near the close of the Sixty-second Congress, when the so-called employers' liability and workmen's compensation bill was brought to the floor of this House. The laboring people were asking for an employers' liability act which would make it possible for employees who are injured in the service of the railroads engaged in interstate commerce, or the widows or other dependents of employees killed in such service, to recover damages without having to resort to a long and expensive prosecution of their claims in the courts. Every laborer and every friend of labor on the floor of this House, including myself, favored the passage of such a law. But we wanted it to benefit the laborer and not place additional burdens upon him, and to my surprise I found in the bill when it reached the House a provision that gave to the employer an advantage over the employee that would have made it almost impossible for the latter to have recovered damages for injuries received.

The bill provided for the creation of a commission to pass upon claims for injuries sustained. It gave to the employee the right to appeal from the decision of the commission to the court in the county where the cause of action arose. But it gave to the employer the right to appeal to the court in the county where the cause of action arose or in the county where the employer was doing business, which meant in the county where his main office was located. When I discovered this provision I went to the men who had drawn the bill and who were among the best lawyers in this House and pointed out to them that that provision would destroy the whole purpose of the bill and would, if the employer desired to take advantage of it, make it almost impossible for claimants to prosecute their claims, for the reason that any railroad company could locate its main office in any county in a State in which it was doing business and appeal all cases to the court of that county, and any number of companies could have located their main offices in a given county anywhere in the State and appealed all claims for damages to the courts of that particular county. For instance, there are some six or eight railroads operating in my State engaged in interstate commerce. Each of these roads could have, if that bill had become a law, located their main offices at one point—we will say at Louisville. Then every claim in the State of Kentucky for injuries sustained in the service could have been carried on appeal to the courts of Louisville, which would have meant the defeat of many of the claimants, because many of them, and I will say most of them, would not have been financially able to go to that point and attend court in the prosecution of their claims. For instance, is it reasonable to suppose that the injured employee or his widow, with a family of dependent children, could go from the head of Big Sandy or from the towns of Ashland, Russell, Fullerton, Maysville, or Jackson, in eastern Kentucky, or from any of the points of western or southern Kentucky, to Louisville and defray the expenses necessary to the proper prosecution of a case? They could not do so, and if that bill had become a law many a just claim would have been defeated by its enactment and operation.

I stated a while ago that as soon as I discovered this vicious provision in the bill I went to the gentlemen who had drawn it and called their attention to the fact that the bill as drawn would not benefit the employee, but, to the contrary, would place additional and unwarranted burdens upon him and his dependents. They each agreed with me, and each disclaimed responsibility for the provision referred to, and each contended that that provision had evidently gotten into the bill through error. But, nevertheless, it was there, and the bill was being considered under a special rule, which made it impossible to amend it, even to the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t"; and under such circumstances we were forced to support it as a whole or reject it as a whole, and I, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of labor, voted against it and did all I could to defeat it. But it passed the House and was sent to the Senate, where it died a natural death, and it was a blessing to the employees of the entire country that it met such a fate.

The bill had the support of the representatives of organized labor. But doubtless those men had overlooked its vicious provision to which I have referred, which was designed to discriminate against labor, or else that provision had been written into it after it had received their approval. But that was neither here nor there with me. It was my duty as a friend to labor to protect, so far as I was able, the laborers of my district and the country against the hardship that was about to be thrust upon them through such deception, error, or incompetency, as the case might be; and I have never entertained the slightest fear of danger at the hands of my constituents as a result of my course. But to the contrary, I have received their commendation, as evidenced by the support given me by the laboring people of my district in my campaigns that came afterwards. Now, what is the issue involved; what are we called upon to meet? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is plain and simple. The Borland amendment proposes to standardize the working day for Government employees and make the standard day eight hours, the standard that is demanded by the laboring people throughout the land. I, as a friend to labor, have stood by and voted for that standard in the past, and shall stand by and support it to-day.

Yes, I am for labor, but I am not for discrimination in favor of special classes of labor, and further, I support the Borland amendment not only because I believe that all labor should be treated fairly, but also because of another principle involved.

I, with my party, have opposed special legislation; I have opposed special benefits to special classes of this country; and I can not vote against the Borland amendment without repudiating my former stand upon those questions, because the same principle is involved, and, gentlemen, there is no way of getting away from it. Why should the man who toils on the farm, why should the man who toils in the factory work 8 and 10 hours, and these gentlemen who work in the departments at Washington at a much higher salary, who have a desk and a soft chair, work only 7 hours? I do not object to their having all of the conveniences that can be afforded the offices and all the salary to which they are entitled, but why should they receive special consideration at the hands of this Congress in the amount of labor to be performed? This is the question, my friends, that we have got to meet, a question that we must answer when we return to our people. As I said, I am for the laboring man, I am a friend to the clerks in the departments. But I am also a friend to the laboring man who by the application of his muscle to the implements of the farm, the shop, the mill or the factory is eking out an existence for less money than the clerks in the departments at Washington are receiving. Then why extend to the latter this special favor? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the Borland amendment because the newspapers of Washington are opposed to it. I am not opposed to the Borland amendment because the business interests of Washington are opposed to it. I am not opposed to the Borland amendment because it might tend to rearrange the hours of employment of the clerks. I am opposed to the Borland amendment as a matter of principle. I think it is a poor precedent for the Government of the United States to establish in trying to economize at this time by increasing their labors 7⅐ per cent without increasing the compensation in proportion, to say the least. If a private employer was to attempt to raise the hours of his employees, the first thing that he would have would be a strike on his hands. There is no possibility of that as far as the Government employees are concerned. It is easy for gentlemen to stand up in Congress and introduce resolutions, especially where the employees have not been organized and thereby can not secure the help of their fellow workers throughout the land to preserve the conditions they have and to fight for better conditions through their affiliations, thereby securing adequate compensation for labor performed.

I am opposed to this proposition, because I think it is bad policy for the Government of the United States to attempt to disturb a condition that has existed for very many years. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky who has just taken his seat [Mr. FIELDS] that it is not a question of legislation, which means the reduction of hours of labor, it is a legislation which means that you are going to increase the hours of thirty-odd thousand of Government employees who were led to believe when they entered the Government service that their hours of labor were seven and the salary would be so much. You are attempting to decrease the number of employees by increasing the length of the workday, and you are not going to please the working people of the country in general or the civil-service employees in the service outside of the District of Columbia, because they do not begrudge the employes in the departments at Washington any advantage they may have at the present time.

I want to say to these gentlemen who have stated that they are in favor of the amendment that they had an excellent opportunity a few weeks ago to economize if they wanted to economize. The Post Office Department during the past year attempted to economize at the expense of the rural mail service by rearranging the routes, whereby they contended they could save $5,000,000. They also put up the proposition that if the rural mail delivery of this country was let out by contract they would save something in the neighborhood of $18,000,000. I opposed the policy of the Post Office Department at that time, just as I am opposing the Borland amendment now. I am opposed to lengthening the hours of labor on the routes of the rural mail carriers and I am unalterably opposed to the department letting the work by contract, knowing full well the contractor would make his profits out of the overworked employees, and, further, because I believe the Postal Service can only be administered efficiently by civil-service employees who receive fair treatment in the matter of hours, wages, and working conditions. Practically every one of the gentlemen who have taken the floor here to-day in favor of the Borland amendment fought against that policy on the part of the Post Office Department, and to my notion it was for one reason, and that is because the rural mail carriers of this country are organized and control votes, and the gentlemen heard from those men on their routes and were up here in their defense. Some of those carriers worked, as was stated, four and five hours a day and the department wanted to pay them for the four or five hours' labor. These gentlemen could have economized in that instance; but no, the rural mail carriers control votes, while the poor Government employee in Washington has no vote and up to the present time has had no organization. I was opposed to the Post Office Department, I was with the rural mail carriers, and I am with the Government clerk in Washington now.

I hope that the organization that he has formed will prove as powerful to him in the future as the organization of the rural mail carriers has to them, and if that be so they will not be disturbed by riders or amendments to appropriation bills in the future, if they will take the opportunity of getting in touch with other organized workers in the country who have votes. It will save them from these onslaughts. Two weeks ago the Borland amendment had plenty of friends on the floor of the House. To-day they are going down like tenpins—so much so that one gentleman said here that it had no more chance than a snowball in Washington in the summer time, and that is the fact, and it is because the Government clerks in Washington have organized, and some day they will rise up and thank our good friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] for being the man who woke them from the slumber they have so long indulged.

The amendment will throw out of employment between three and four thousand Government employees, and who will go—the young and strong man and woman? Not at all; it will be the old superannuated clerk who has given the best years of his or her life to the service of the Government, and they will be relegated to the Government scrap heap and in many instances become a charge on society.

There is only one efficient and fair way to reclassify the civil service, and that is for Congress to pass a civil-service retirement bill, which would give the superannuated employees a chance to pass their last days in comfort at least, and every Government employee could look forward to a peaceful end and not be confronted with the poorhouse in the end.

Defeat this amendment; do not let the Government of the United States be charged with bad faith in encouraging men and women to enter its employ in Washington and guaranteeing certain conditions of employment, and then changing the conditions without compensation for the changed conditions.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the Borland amendment because I do not believe that eight hours of clerical work are too many; neither do I believe that they are too few. As conditions now are, I shall stand for an eight-hour working-day in most avocations, believing that a lesser working period will reduce production—which is wealth, and should become more nearly common wealth—in this country under present economic conditions.

The question of a seven-hour versus an eight-hour day for Government clerks brings up another question which is vastly more vital to the public service than this particular amendment. It brings up the question of civil pensions. It is a flat bit of commonplace sophistry to say that if we are going to provide civil pensions we must provide for pensioning all those in need—the aged and the incompetent—everywhere. The time will come when society will look after the infant and aged as a matter of course, if their own people are unable to support them; but in the meantime it is not fair to say that if we work out a contributory pension system for Government employees we must, therefore, pension all other aged and incompetent people. It is a matter of looking after our Federal employees. The literature of to-day is filled with sad stories of faithful employees neglected in their old age by their employers. Such neglect of an obvious duty forms a lot of the tragedy of modern stories of modern life. Many of the corporations of the country provide for their employees by a pension system; and we, representing the Federal Government, must face the proposition that if we are going to do justice to these superannuated employees we must furnish them with the opportunity of having pensions in their old age and in their incompetency, nay, of forcing such pensions upon them. We can not afford to keep them in Government employment, for that is setting a low pace for work.

I can appreciate the objection that the labor unions have to setting such a high pace that it grinds out people's lives, but here we are having a pace made in Government service by those who never ought to be in Government service; and there is hardly a man on the floor of this House who has not at one time or another gone to a department begging the reinstatement of some superannuated employee to a position he can not fill.

In the Sixty-second Congress the Committee on Civil Service Reform had hearings and worked for some 70 hours on a plan of civil pensions, recognizing the fact that injustice should not be done to our Federal employees beyond the customs of enlightened corporations, and in order that we might secure efficiency in the Government service, but no action was then taken or has been taken since. The heads of the departments are human beings, full of human sympathy, and they can not bear to turn out to starvation these old employees. The result is that the Government service is exceedingly inefficient. This Borland amendment, to my mind, is just and proper in setting the standard working day at eight hours. I should like to see it amended so there could be no question even of a request to work beyond eight hours without receiving extra pay. I believe that it will lead to a recognition of the perfectly obvious fact which other Governments in Europe understand, and that is that to have justice done to old employees of the Government, and justice done to the good of the service, we must have civil pensions. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, "stop picking on me." If I were to epitomize the cry of Washington to-day I would say that it was summed up in that cry, "Stop picking on me." It seems to be a fad for legislators when they come here to endeavor to devise some method by which they can regulate Washington, and this is one of them. The gentleman who has just concluded, the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT], and who says that he is in favor of pensioning superannuated Government employees, would first preface that very beneficial work by kicking 3,400 men onto the scrap heap. I do not belong in that class. If the Borland amendment were adopted we would have 10 per cent less, for if he did not want to throw out the superannuated employees, he would have to kick out 10 per cent of the verile, young, diligent, and efficient men and keep the old men. Either horn of the dilemma is bad.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I can not because I have only five minutes. I have a great deal of respect for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], but I think his energy in this case is misdirected. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. I can give the gentleman some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I notice that his amendment provides that the clerks shall work not less than eight hours. There is every reason in the world for people being opposed to this amendment even if it provided that they shall work not more than eight hours. If you are going to increase the labor of men, then come in with a just proposition and increase their pay for the extra labor that you demand. Those two things go hand in hand. One of the most peculiar features of this amendment is that it is the product and work of one man, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. I am not deprecating his efficiency, because I think he has been unduly criticized, but I object to legislation affecting 34,000 employees, affecting those dependent upon 34,000 employees, affecting every store and every part of this great city of Washington, being passed without proper consideration. We ought not to go to work bull-headedly and affect those 34,000 people and their dependents and the storekeepers and business people of the city of Washington generally.

It is a blow at the city of Washington and its prosperity—poor, helpless city of Washington, that has no legislative representative here to speak for it. I have always been opposed to these legislative drives at Washington, inasmuch as the people are not represented. They have not got a vote, and so men come here and they say, "Let us try it on the dog. Let us try this thing on Washington, and then we will be able to go home and tell our constituents what a wonderful place we made of the city of Washington." There is pending now, and we will soon be called upon to vote upon it, I suppose, a bill to make Washington dry. Washington is a pretty good place now. It looks to me like a very orderly, moral, decent place, but some gentlemen want to go back home and parade their virtues, and they want to make Washington dry in order that they can go back and tell their constituents about it. Representatives who believe in a republican form of government and in the people propose not even to allow the people of Washington to say whether they want it dry or whether they want it wet. Give the people not what they want but what we, the Representatives, want is their cry. Peculiar legislation, my friends. I am opposed to this Borland amendment and I trust it will be voted down. If we want to do anything in a sane way, in an orderly way, in a proper way, let us appoint a committee and let it consider the needs and necessities of the clerks. Let it consider the needs and necessities of the city of Washington; let it come back here with a comprehensive report before us, so that we can in an orderly, sane, and intelligent manner write legislation that will be effective, that will be decent, that will be in accord with every sense of justice and fair play. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, there is a principle of law that we all ought to have some respect for when we begin to measure any matter of legislation, especially when it affects salaries and the expenditure of public money. It is not only true, the statement I will make in reference to Government employees, but it is true with reference to the services which all men shall render in society. Every man should be taught that he should render a quid pro quo to society for all that he takes out of society. Not only that, but instead of teaching people that they have got to take everything they can out of society they ought to be taught the great principle of endeavoring to put all the good they can into society; and the philosophy of modern times and the doctrine being taught in this House are fundamentally wrong. These gentlemen who are making the announcement that they are the friends of the Government clerks as though they were the only friends that the clerks had. No man is an enemy of the Government clerk who shall say to him that he should perform eight hours of honest service. Every department of the Government outside of the city of Washington requires eight hours of Government service. Not only that, if they did not require that in the manufacturing plants of the Government, in the post offices of the Government, they shall perform eight hours' service along by the side of the great industrial plants, where the fight now is on the part of laboring men to get the blessedness of an eight-hour day as a standard of work, there would be upheavals of all kinds and character; and I do not believe that any man, if he will get out of the atmosphere that surrounds them here in Washington, if he will get out of this atmosphere, where, instead of having one representative on the floor of this Congress, this Washington press and Washington society coerce hundreds of Representatives. Some men when they stay here any length of time begin to lose the real true relation of things and forget the taxpayer. Not only that, but the Government clerk under the present system, even under the civil service, by reason of the fact that they have been able to get those places which they clamored for because some Senator or some Congressman stood sponsor for them and went down and saw that they got a place in the Government, these men, retaining their connections back home, come and make all of these men understand that "You got me here, and I have to look to you, and you must see that I work just as little as possible." So that there is no ground for the statement that any Government employee does not have plenty of spokesmen on this floor.

If there is anything that we all ought to be willing to stand for, it is equal treatment at the hands of the Federal Government of every Government employee. Every man ought to understand that in this life you can not equalize conditions, you can not equalize men in intellect, you can not equalize men in economy, you can not equalize their capacity for acquiring and saving money. The only thing that the Government can and ought to do is to give every man equal opportunities of endeavor and place upon him equal burdens, and in stating to the world that you do not expect an eight-hour labor from a Government employee, you virtually say to every other laboring man in the Government, yes, in the social, business, and economical world, that he ought not to be called upon to labor but seven hours. It is wrong and there ought not to be that sort of principle here. Now, the only trouble I have is being able to get one-hundredth part of the number of places that I am asked to get in the Government, and I have never yet had a man ask me how many hours of work is required, because the taxpayers, that forgotten, inarticulate mass, those people who only speak on election day and only speak about those things which are brought to their attention, who only speak on those issues of the campaign, those people whom Carlisle called the inarticulate mass, the patient, toiling people, as he expressed it, on the farm, in the factory and in the mines, patient and long suffering—and they have been patient and long suffering in every Republic that existed on the earth, and they are patient and long suffering in all the history of the past—but when the time does come and this inarticulate mass does make up its mind to speak, it speaks with the force of Niagara and speaks in thunder tones. They may speak sooner than we think.

When you shall begin to set the precedent here that men shall not be called upon to work more than seven hours and you set in motion that thought and let it find a lodgment in the hearts and minds of millions of laborers throughout this country that work on the farm and in the factory, I ask you, then, what will be the general result? When the food products are becoming scarcer, when the number of men to be fed are increasing, and when the number of acres have been fixed by the God that made the earth and fixed the boundaries of the continents, what will you do then with the productive classes that are producing all the wealth of the world? What will become of you if your Government has established a principle that you shall have just as little labor as possible out of a man in a certain given time and then that the time shall be gradually reduced? I ask you what will that lesson do? Shall we adopt this new principle or shall we go back and take the principle laid down in the Scriptures, which points all mankind to the ant, because the ant is the one insect of the earth that labors against the rainy day; that labors against the winter; and he points mankind to the folly of the grasshopper, that during the summer season has a glorious time—works less than eight hours. And while we all sympathize with the sun-browned hand of toil and we all believe that every man that labors should be given value received for that labor—he is entitled to it—let us teach that every man should render in public and in private life the best service of which he is capable. Instil in the minds and hearts of the Government employees some idea that they are doing a glorious and great service, and when a man is in love with that employment, when a man is in love with the duties which he is performing, you will not find so much complaint then as to long hours, because when a man loves his employment he devotes his time and attention to it because he does love it. And those be the ones outside of the few who are pulled up by the boot straps of political influence in the positions they are unworthy of holding who complain most and work least. You will find when that principle of honest effort and work is established in the Government service, is established in all the factories and all the plants, that every man shall labor honestly for eight hours, labor for the interest of his employer, labor for his advancement and upbuilding, will become the man that will be advanced, will become the man that ere long will be one of the directors of the concern and one of its managers.

And so it is that if the great morale and esprit de corps could be inculcated in the army of employees here in Washington you then would find that there would be no such clamor as there is now, because they are a favored class and have no right to complain. The ordinary bookkeeper back in the villages and towns of this country will get $50 a month, and the Government pays $1,200 to $1,800 a year for the same work. If you do not believe it, just let the people of the District understand that there are hundreds of positions ranging from $900 to $1,800 a year and you will find 500 applications for them, each of whom are just as capable and efficient as the ones you now have in the service. What I want to call your attention to is that influence in Washington that is clamoring for short hours and more pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. I want to call your attention to the influence that surrounds us here and surrounds the employee. These very business institutions that are complaining to the Congressman about the treatment we are giving to the Federal employee, those self-same merchants, are working the girls eight hours or longer a day, and they are paying them $3, $4, and $5 a week, and the girl that gets $7 a week is most fortunate. These be most peculiar critics of the past treatment which the Government employees have had.

Let me call your attention also to the fact that the law formerly was that the Government clerk should render eight hours' service and might be required in some departments to render ten. That was back in the seventies. That law, as was called attention to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], was ignored to such an extent that at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, especially in the War and Navy and State Departments, they had to almost double the number of employees, and the Congress, when Mr. McKinley was President, put on the statute books that statute that there should not be less than seven hours of labor.

Now, gentleman complain, "Oh, if you put one hour on, you ought to increase the pay." As a matter of fact, the salaries were fixed in former times when they were less than they are now, very much less, at not less than 8, and, in some departments, 10 hours a day, but since that time, since that hour, for almost every department of the Government the legislative bill carries an increase of salary. Why, in the bill that just passed there is an increase of pay in the Library. In the legislative bill which passed before there were several hundred employees increased, and in the deficiency bill occasionally, where they are able to show the necessity, they put on additional clerks and increase the pay; in the sundry civil acts you increase the pay, and the Agricultural Department appropriation bill carries increase of pay. In all the other bills, like the Army and Navy and Post Office bills, there was an increase of pay for the employees all through, and the reason for it was, they say, that the cost of living is increasing.

So I think the Government has been most kind to employees. And in times of stress and storm if your revenues are low, the highest test of the patriotism or the interest which a man has in his Government, is whether he is willing to make a little personal sacrifice in order to serve his Government. Why, men not connected with this Government, the ordinary laboring man, the ordinary farmer, who is called upon to earn every dollar that goes into its Treasury, is called upon to produce it, and when war comes he is not only called upon to pay his taxes, but in addition to that he is called upon to go out and die for this country, and the Government employee is not, and can not be drafted. Oh, when you talk about the goodness of this Government, it has been most kind to its employees and to all the people in it. The people outside are all trying to get into the Government service, and it is a most dangerous thing to select out a class of officeholders and give to them such enormous special privileges that every man in private life considers himself unfortunate if he is laboring and toiling outside and can not get on the Government pay roll. God forbid that that time should ever come in America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to say that a girl employed in private enterprise was fortunate indeed if she was able to get $7 a week for her services.

Mr. SISSON. I said in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Wherever it may be, God forbid that that condition should ever exist under the Government of the United States! [Applause.] That is the one thing of which every American should be ashamed. That is the thing that creates immorality throughout the United States, and every American man and woman everywhere, from coast to coast, should start out as a missionary to prevent the continuation of that character of payment for services rendered.

The law of the land as to Government employees provides that outside of Washington men and women shall not work more than eight hours a day, and it also provides that when they do work more than eight hours a day they shall be paid compensation for the overtime equal to that which they receive as their regular pay. The law now providing for the employment of those within the District of Columbia says that not less than seven hours shall be a day's work.

Why change it? The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] provides, if it should be enacted into law, that the people employed by the Government in the District of Columbia shall work not less than eight hours a day, instead of not more than eight hours a day. The hours of labor cut very little figure in the case. Some people can do more in two hours than others can do in eight, and most people can do more in seven hours than anybody can do in eight. I can recall very well when I was a boy stonecutters were the first tradesmen in the Union that were given an eight-hour day, and they were given that in 1869, long before there was any American Federation of Labor; and to-day we give our men employed in that service an eight-hour day, and we give them 15 minutes for lunch at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes for lunch at 3 o'clock, making a seven and one-half hour day, and we consider that we make money by it, because we realize that men can do more when they are at their best than they can do when they are overworked.

And to-day if in the District of Columbia the men and women employed in the departments are called upon to go to work before the sun rises in the morning and to get back from their work about the time the moon rises, they would never see the light of day, and proper consideration for humanity demands that the sunlight shall have an opportunity to shine upon American citizens every day in the year, if it does shine at all, and so we fix the system of hours of labor in these departments that will enable those who are employed there to get out into God's sunshine once in a while. People who are employed in factories, as a rule, do not go to church on Sunday morning, because they consider it better morality to go out and play baseball, so as to get into the sunshine, because they have not had the opportunity to get the sunshine during the week.

The Government of the United States ought to be the model employer of America, and these men and these women who devote their lives to the service of the Government do a patriotic duty, more patriotic than the man who serves on the battle line, for there is no opportunity for glory there, nor for advancement, and they learn nothing in their employments that is of any use to them out in the world; so that they have only one employer, one opportunity to eke out an existence while they are on the pay roll, and to die and be buried in an unknown grave. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that there are legitimate arguments that may be made on both sides of this question. However, I can not agree with my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] nor with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] that every proposition that comes up here affecting the District of Columbia is fathered by a demagogue who wants to go back home and brag about how he has tried the medicine on the dog. Whenever I hear a man talking about other people being demagogues I always feel like he is sprinkling red pepper on his own tracks to keep the bloodhounds from tracing him.

Now, there is only one thing that makes me hate to vote for this Borland amendment. So far as the men who are employed in the departments in Washington are concerned, I can very heartily vote that they shall work eight hours; but on account of the great number of women who are employed in the different departments I have hesitated somewhat to espouse the cause of the Borland amendment. I wish it were not necessary for a single woman anywhere in the United States to have to work her life away in the departments in Washington or elsewhere, not because they are less efficient than the men, not because they are less deserving than the men—nine times out of ten they are more so—not because they do not render efficient, faithful, and devoted service to the Government in the departments, but because I do not believe the conditions in society ought to be such as to force women to go into the departments and spend their lives there in the grind and confinement of constant work.

But I am not confronted at this time with the duty of reforming the Government departments. If all the Government employees worked seven hours a day, I might hesitate to vote on short notice for increasing the hours of any of them to eight; but in view of the fact that some of them work seven hours and some of them work eight hours, I think all of them should either be reduced to seven hours or all of them increased to eight hours; and as the only proposition now before us for consideration is standardizing all of them at eight hours a day, I expect to vote for the Borland amendment.

Last year there were 1,200 vacancies in the civil-service classified employees of the United States. How many applications do you suppose there were before the Civil Service Commission for filling these 1,200 vacancies? More than 16,000 men and women in the United States took the examination and became eligible for appointment to 1,200 positions in this country, a fraction over 13 applicants for every vacancy that was created in the entire classified service of the United States. That is an average of more than applied for any other known vacancies in any department of human endeavor in this country. Thirteen men are standing at the door and asking for each vacancy, in addition to those who try to get on the list and fail. That being so, I have not yet reached the conclusion that a Government position is a very undesirable place, or that the surroundings of the Government employees are so unsatisfactory as to justify us in howling and wailing because somebody wants to compel them to do a full day's work.

Mr. GOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Member from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] on his great influence with the Committee on Appropriations. He has been able, apparently, to have adopted as part of the bill under consideration a most important piece of legislation without any argument before the committee as to its wisdom. His simple wish seems to have been all that was necessary to induce the committee to insert the provision. I doubt if there is another Member in this House who could be so influential with that committee, and I am curious to know how he exercises such great influence.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that our able and genial friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has not used his great power with the committee in a way which would be more beneficial to the Government and the great army of clerks upon whom he proposes to impose extra service without additional compensation, or even affording them a hearing as to the existing adverse conditions under which they are laboring.

When I was a very young man I was a store clerk in a mining town in southern Ohio which supplied a large territory, some of the customers living from 8 to 10 miles from the store. The management of the store followed the policy of delivering the stale eggs and bad butter, and other edibles of doubtful value, to the customers living the farthest away, on the theory that it would not be so easy for them to make complaint or raise serious objections to this imposition. It would appear that the Committee on Appropriations, in this instance, is following out the same policy, and are proposing to impose upon a large class of deserving people conditions which can not in any way be justified by law or reason, because of their helplessness and their inability to make serious objections.

I wonder whether or not the gentleman from Missouri, or any other member of the Committee on Appropriations who supported the provision, would be so willing to support an amendment of this kind if the employees lived in his district.

Mr. FIELDS. Will my friend yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will.

Mr. FIELDS. It seems that by the Government system of imposing eight hours a day on the clerks out in the country we have been resorting to the spoiled-egg system to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Not at all. On the contrary, in my opinion, if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] affected five of his own constituents, I do not believe he would have introduced an amendment of this kind.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman does not mean to leave the impression that the reason he is opposing this amendment is that there are five people in his district who are affected by it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Many of them would be affected; but I am speaking especially for the 35,000 employees of the Government who have no chance to protest against this imposition. Why should the department clerks in Washington be treated as if they were slaves and subject to the whim or caprice of their employer, instead of as American citizens, entitled to a hearing and a fair deal.

Mr. Chairman, my life has been comparatively happy, but there are three days which stand out as more happy than all the rest. One of them, of course, was the day I was married; another was the day, more than 25 years ago, when I, as a young man full of energy and ambition, accepted a position as a department clerk at the munificent salary of $75 per month, believing that the Government offered a field for advancement, and that industry and capacity would win substantial recognition, but what a disappointment awaited me; the third exceptionally happy day was the one on which I tendered my resignation, after having served a sentence of seven months in the capacity of a Government clerk, to enter a field that was more promising. I therefore know something by experience and observation of the difficulties and discouraging conditions which confront the great majority of Government employees, and feel justified in expressing my sympathy for those who are sentenced for life to the Government treadmill.

Instead of demanding extra service, the Government should pay for overtime. As a matter of fact, there are thousands of clerks in the departments who are working extra time to keep the work current, for which they receive no compensation whatever, and many of them do not take advantage of the leave of absence under the law for the same reason. During the Spanish-American War there were hundreds of clerks in the Navy and War Departments who worked extra time, extending over a period of nearly 18 months, for which they received no compensation. There are thousands of clerks in the departments who are receiving less wages than are being paid to skilled laborers in the trades, and, while hours have been shortened and wages increased in other lines of endeavor during the last 10 years, the poor department clerk must quietly submit and be thankful for the salary he receives, even though it is so small.

The high character and ability of the clerks in the departments should be taken into consideration. A great proportion of them are college-bred men and women. It would be an easy thing, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, to duplicate in the departments the membership of this House, probably many times, when it comes to a matter of education, capacity, culture, and experience. They are just as conscientious and patriotic and devoted to their duties and the country's interest as we are and are entitled to the consideration and fair dealing which we claim for ourselves.

The Borland amendment is, in my opinion, nothing more nor less than an attempt by legislative robbery to exact an extra hour's service each day from the department clerks. I believe that I am as well informed in regard to the onerous duties imposed upon the department clerks and the demands made upon them by their division chiefs, who are charged with the responsibility of getting out the work, as is any Representative in Congress.

I do not believe that 10 per cent of the clerks are able to save any money for unexpected needs or the purchase of a home from their meager salaries because of the increasing cost of living and the necessity of spending more on account of the character of their work and their environments for clothes and living expenses for themselves and family than those in some other walks of life where the compensation is higher.

Their work is most exhausting, both mentally and physically, and, while it is true that many Members of Congress, including myself, work 10 or 12 hours a day, our work is not nearly as irksome or exhausting, as we are not compelled to sit at a desk in a stuffy room for seven hours, but have an opportunity of moving about.

It is rather poor encouragement to the clerks when they are notified that they must donate an extra hour each day to the Government without additional compensation, and the proposed plan will not have a tendency, if adopted, to secure from them any more work or closer application to their duties.

There are many clerks who, because of ill health or age, are performing the limit of work now, and if an extra hour should be placed upon them it would in many instances mean that they would soon be totally disabled for the performance of the duties required of them.

Every department clerk, when he takes his oath of office, enters into a contract with the Government to render seven hours' work per day at the entrance salary, with the tacit assurance that he will be advanced as vacancies occur. To require an additional hour's service without additional pay is an arbitrary rescindment of the contract and could not be enforced in any court of justice were the contract between individuals. It is simply an arbitrary, unreasonable, and dishonest method of taking from a large class of people service without compensation.

What we should do is to increase the salary of department clerks receiving less than $2,500 at least 15 per cent, enact a law establishing a contributory pension system, and provide that 5 per cent of each clerk's salary should go into a pension fund to retire the clerks who are too infirm or advanced in years to continue in service. Such a plan would provide for the promotion of deserving clerks and invite into the service bright, active young men and women who would be encouraged to prepare themselves for a proper discharge of the important duties imposed upon them.

An intelligent administration of the laws requires as much preparation and experience and as high a degree of ability as making the laws, and it is a mistake to assume that because of the small salaries that are being paid the employees of the Government that their work is not of the greatest importance.

I personally know men in the departments receiving from $1,200 to $2,000 a year who, if they were in private employment, would receive five times as much, and yet, because of the fact that they are established here and interested in their work and are rearing families, they hesitate to give up their positions to enter private employment.

I am utterly opposed to the Borland amendment and am doing all I can to convince my colleagues that its enactment would work a great injustice upon a very deserving class of people. It is unfortunate that we are living under an administration that is so short of revenue that it is proposed to resort to what I think would be legislative robbery of the Government employee to get money to prevent a larger deficiency than is now staring us in the face. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a letter which I have received from a department clerk, which I think fairly represents the clerks' side of the question, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28, 1916.

To the FRIENDS OF THE GOVERNMENT CLERKS.

GENTLEMEN: It might be considered an impropriety for a clerk to appeal against the amendment which is directed against his welfare, but he may be permitted to relate a page of much neglected history.

It is asserted by officials, by legislators, and even by our faithful friends of the press that the standard of clerical wages has remained unchanged since 1854. Is this true?

It is a fact that it has not been raised, but until the seventies, and perhaps later, men entered clerical life at $1,200 per annum, women at $900. I believe no lower grades existed, except for watchmen, messengers, and laborers.

Probably the earliest innovation was the establishment of a clerical grade at $1,000, at which men might enter and to which women would be promoted, instead of to $1,200 as theretofore. Afterwards were established clerical and subclerical grades at $840, $800, $720, $660, and I was told not many years ago that women were working in the Treasury Department at $540 and $480 per annum. It is the easier to believe this possible when we read in the estimates, which will form the basis for the appropriation for the next fiscal year, that six "expert counters" in the Treasurer's office are booked for a reduction from $800 to $700 and six others for a reduction from $700 to $600. And be it remembered that an "expert counter" pays for her mistakes out of her own "real money."

The result of the institution of all these lower ratings is that few men have been in recent years appointed at $1,200 and almost no women at $900, but each must climb through a succession of lower grades to reach the entrance pay of the fifties and sixties.

Nor is this all. In 1875 an hour was added to the clerical day and later on another half hour, equivalent to two more reductions of the standard of wages.

The maximum wage of $1,800, instituted in 1854, has not been advanced.

The argument of the Member from Idaho that each change of this character is a breach of contract seems to be indisputable.

Meantime the rapid increase in the price of all living necessities—rents, food products, fuel, clothing—is so promptly admitted by everybody that it is not a debatable proposition.

The wages of almost every other class of earners has doubled and trebled, and the profits of "big business" for a single year would constitute what was called wealth in the fifties.

Another reduction in the standard of wages of Government employees is now seriously contemplated.

The question is not so much "Can you stand another hour?" as "What next?"

Legislation concerning us is seldom positive. It is generally "at the discretion of" a series of administrations, with a magnificent succession of Cabinets.

It is stated and restated that every clerk has 30 days' leave and 30 days' sick leave every year. Is this true? It is possible, but optional with the higher officials. In the office in which I was employed many years one of the first acts of a new chief of bureau was to reduce the annual leave of his clerks from 30 to 15 days. The same year a new Assistant Secretary abolished sick leave throughout his entire department. Loss of time occasioned by a tie-up of transportation or other unavoidable accident varies in different offices, some charging the actual time lost, others a half hour, others a quarter hour, for a minute's delinquency. The watchmen are allowed to take their annual leave, but they are required to remain on duty on Sunday. In some departments a chief of bureau can only approve a 10 days' absence for sickness. Longer illness must be treated as a special case, pay to be approved or denied by the Cabinet officer at the head of the department.

The Congress a few years ago enacted that Saturday after 12 m. is a legal holiday "for all purposes" in the District. The Cabinet, however, does not permit the clerical force to take advantage of the law, but an Executive order permits it, on 13 summer Saturdays to leave work at 1 o'clock, on condition that the usual half hour shall not be taken for luncheon (although that half hour is not a part of the seven-hour day for labor). So the Saturday half holiday, legalized by Congress for the year round, and enjoyed by Government clerks outside of Washington, dwindles here to 3 hours on each of 13 Saturdays, provided the force can be spared!

This adds to the satire of the suggestion that possibly if the clerical working day is lengthened a Saturday half holiday may be enacted—as if it had not already been enacted and snugly set forth in the code by the side of Christmas and Fourth of July, even declared by the Attorney General to apply to Federal employees, enjoyed by mechanics and clerks in railroad offices and other respected classes of labor, but ignored in the Federal offices of Washington.

But, it is urged, "promotion is reasonably rapid." Is this true? I should not have to step out of my tracks to find a clerk in Government employ 41 years, who served 28 years before reaching the wages earned in private employ previous to entry, who has only been promoted once in 35 years, yet who has never been accused by one who could be honestly called a "superior" of idleness, inferiority, breach of discipline, inefficiency, or immorality.

It has been remarked that the Federal service is an exceptionally profitable one to women. Is this true? A Census Office bulletin, published after the 1900 figures had been tabulated, stated that only 19 women in the service in the United States were receiving the maximum clerical wage of $1,800 a year. Business women would not consider this a startling or widespread triumph. And the majority of women in the service do not receive over half the maximum wage.

The Civil Service Commission laments that the most promising applicants, when appointments are sent to them and conditions and salary stated, refuse to accept the positions.

The clerks, both men and women, are paying for modest homes, supporting families, educating children, contributing to churches and charities, upholding the State and the Nation.

Instead of striking another blow to discourage them in their already unequal struggle, in the light of this true history, why not instead renew their courage by some consideration—especially by retiring the aged and the crippled, with decent means of subsistence, thus leaving more room for the advancement of the younger, and also adding to the self-respect of the personnel of the service, and to the dignity of the record of a Nation.

It is sometimes argued that the constituency of Congress would look with disfavor upon a civil retirement. Yet, the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland, a group of 3,000 hard-headed business men, appointed a committee to study the subject, which after examining every bill introduced for this purpose, reported in favor of a straight civil pension, expressing preference for the Hamill bill, and the report was adopted without a dissenting vote, by the chamber. So some constituencies are open eyed, and living in the twentieth century.

It is recorded that nearly every nation pensions it civil service, and that all the large and humanized nations have enacted an old-age pension for the entire citizenship.

Sometimes the expense of a civil-service pension is compared with the roll of the Civil War. There is no parallel. Boys went into that war at 17 and 18, and were not infrequently disabled before they were 20. Some lived until they were 70, pensioned at an increasing rate. If clerks were to be retired at 70, or even at 65, their years on the roll would be comparatively very few. No one grudged the pension to the young soldiers. No one need grudge it to the old clerks or to any old persons liable to destitution. "Age and want, that mismatched pair," are seen too frequently. No nation can afford to carry that blemish in these days when the world is crying for high ideals.

We are more grateful to those who have befriended the clerks than words can express. We have hoped for retirement legislation at this session. Now, so much strength goes to avoid the hour, it seems as if nothing would be left to provide for the wintry years.

Very respectfully, yours,

RUTH G. D. HAVENS,
No. 35 M Street NW.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. GOOD. I also yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Iowa each yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I did not expect to speak on this amendment. So many friends of labor have suddenly sprung up that I could afford to be silent. This House should organize some celebration in honor of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] for having offered an opportunity to so many Members to declare themselves friends of the worker. We are all friends of labor now at the expense of Uncle Sam. A vote against the Borland amendment will not antagonize any corporation and will not run contrary to the interests of private capital. Why, one may even get some praise from the local press. I wonder how many of these gentlemen would be friends of labor in their private capacities as lawyers for corporations? I wonder how many of them would be willing to show their friendship for labor during the life and death struggle of the unions to improve the conditions of the working people? I wonder how many genuine friends of labor we would have in those hours of need? This amendment will have the effect of increasing the hours of labor of some thirty-odd thousand clerks employed by this Government in the District of Columbia. We are told that out of the 476,366 civil-service employees in the United States 34,430 are in Washington and are treated as a privileged class by reason of the fact that while the latter are required by law to work not less than seven hours a day, all other civil-service employees must work not less than eight hours a day.

We are advised to remove the inequality not by reducing the hours of labor of the majority but by increasing the hours of labor of the small minority. To this I object. The eight-hour day was made the slogan of the labor movement as far back as 1818 in England and as far back as 1884 in the American labor movement. We did not at that time use modern methods of division of labor, nor did we know of the modern and excruciating systems of efficiency. We did not then know how to grind out of the worker every atom of energy. Why, a man to-day in seven hours exerts himself physically and mentally more than people did in a 15-hour day 25 or 30 years ago. There used to be such a thing as singing while at work. It is all concentration now. The modern factory and the modern office are organized on a basis which condenses human labor and makes it impossible for either the mind or the body to rest, so that we have the highest degree of muscular and mental exertion during working hours. And do not forget that among these 34,000 workers who will be affected by the amendment one-third are women.

Now, while I believe in the equality of women, I would like to see the day when every woman would be taken out of the factory and the office, so that her husband, brother, or father might earn enough to support the family. [Applause.] I should like to see the day when the father will be relieved from the competition of mother, wife, sister, or child. [Applause.]

In the painful struggle of the working people, not through your friendship, but through strikes, through facing jail, through defying injunction judges, through contending against all the machinations of capital, and through bravely facing so many "friends" who are not friends, labor has slowly and painfully struggled upward to a point where only one-third of the working people enjoy an eight-hour day now.

But that does not mean that the eight-hour day is the highest ideal of labor's effort. The more new devices we adopt, the more perfect efficiency methods we introduce, the greater the strain upon body, mind, or nervous system, the more urgent is the reduction of the hours of labor.

And just as it would be wrong to lengthen the hours of labor of those who work eight hours a day, because they constitute only one-third of the working class, just so would it be indefensible to lengthen the hours of toil of the minority of civil-service employees, who are now required to work not less than seven hours a day. Whether you believe in this thing or not, you will have to vote down the Borland amendment. That much progress the working class has made. That much progress has been made in Washington. The defeat of the proposed amendment would not affect the capitalistic interests represented by certain elements, and you can afford to be generous. I would have invited you to join the Socialist Party had I believed that you were friends of labor outside of the Borland amendment. [Applause.]

I am having a little fun with you, because I know how you people feel when it comes to a real fight for the working class.

The gentleman from Missouri is entirely wrong when he asks us to pull down the conditions of the 34,000 men and women who have made this slight advance. The eight-hour day was the slogan in the past. It will not be the slogan of labor forever. The clerk must have an opportunity to educate himself. He works more intensely to-day than he ever worked before.

He is exposed to greater mental strain. You have failed to provide any system for the Government clerk or any effective method by which he could appeal for redress. He is precluded from striking. So he is entirely at your mercy. It would be extremely cruel now to increase the hours of labor and discharge 10 per cent of the clerks.

I am glad to hear that the business people of Washington are so partial to the employees. Why do they oppose the Borland amendment? I will tell you; bcause when you have 34,000 people enjoying a larger degree of leisure the business elements are benefited. It is intelligent selfishness on the part of Washington's business world.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Would they be in favor of seven hours a day if they paid it out of their own pockets?

Mr. LONDON. No; undoubtedly they would not. The friendship of the newspapers of Washington is at the expense of Uncle Sam.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from New York remembers that a year or two ago when Congress undertook to reduce the hours of labor for women, that these same parties opposed it.

Mr. LONDON. Of course they did, and I heard a gentleman speak against the Borland amendment who voted against the child-labor bill. [Laughter.] He is also a friend of labor. You have a number of friends of labor in Congress at the expense of Uncle Sam and at the expense of the gentleman from Missouri. What a lot of trouble the gentleman from Missouri has got himself into. [Laughter.] He is making a mistake. If the party of which he is a member can not go forward, why should he insist on pushing it backward. [Laughter and applause.]

Gentlemen, we can not seriously contemplate the lowering of conditions of 34,000 men. The gentleman from Missouri made a mistake. He should withdraw the amendment if he can, and shut out the opportunity of some gentlemen to proclaim their love for the working classes. If we were really genuine in our friendship for the civil-service employees, we would hasten to provide health insurance and pensions for old age. We would provide some method of appeal from unjust discharges. The labor movement is a very serious proposition; the socialist movement is a very serious proposition. It can no longer be trifled with. I must assume that you are sincere, but you are the victims of inherited ideas, you have become the slaves of theories which have no application to modern conditions. The awakened conscience of the world demands more justice for the workingman and the working woman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. LONDON had unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have had, perhaps, more varied experience in the Government service than any man in this House. Thirty-eight years ago I came to Washington as private secretary to a Member of Congress representing the district I now represent. I not only served in that capacity, but later was Assistant Doorkeeper of this House. I was a clerk in the Post Office Department. I was connected with the Treasury Department, with the War Department, with the Department of Justice, and with the State Department prior to my election to Congress. I believe I have actually had a greater opportunity to know something of the work—the services of the Government clerks—in the executive departments of this Government than any man who has spoken here to-day.

We have the highest body of trained, efficient public servants anywhere in the United States. I would match their efficiency, fidelity, and loyalty against that of the officials of any other Government on the face of the earth.

What is the pending proposition? We are asked here, without an investigation of a committee of this House, without asking the opinion or the views of the chief or the head of any bureau of this Government charged with the responsibility of the execution and dispatch of the important and far-reaching business of this great Government, under this proposition, to revolutionize, if not practically paralyze, every branch of the Government service. What else are we requested to do? We are asked to do an injustice—an unfair, an inhuman, and a cruel thing. What is it? That the heads of the bureaus of this Government within 12 months shall summarily discharge practically four or five thousand Government employees.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I want to ask the gentleman if in his unbiased judgment he thinks that all of those 4,000 or 5,000 will be Democrats?

Mr. AUSTIN. Democrats or Republicans, I care not what. I am not speaking now as a partisan. I am speaking alone as an American and with my oath and conscience before me. Every department of this Government has a large number of very old and worn-out deserving Government officials—men and women—and in voting for this proposition we will virtually vote to provide a transfer from the Government bureaus to the poorhouses for them. Many of those employees served in the Union Army and are now clerks in the Pension Office and in other bureaus of the Government. They aided in preserving the Republic. A number of Cabinet officers and bureau chiefs have urged us to provide for the old and superannuated Government employees, to do for our faithful public servants what the private corporations of the country have been doing for years, and instead of meeting that request we answer it by this Borland amendment to kick them out of the Government service. What else? By this amendment we are asked, with one fell swoop, without thought, without study, without investigation, without consideration, to impair the usefulness of every bureau of the Government, and it ought not to be seriously considered by any man in this House. Thousands of these clerks have purchased homes in the country and in the suburbs. Elsewhere in the United States Government officials generally live convenient to their place of business, to the Government buildings. It requires a longer time here for clerks to go from their homes to the place of their work. If you want to legislate, do it in a proper way, in a constructive, intelligent, just way—after a thorough investigation. We ought to increase the pay of the Government clerks. Members of Congress increased their own pay eight years ago from $5,000 to $7,500, and why? On account of the increased cost of living, which not only applied to Congressmen here in Washington City, but to every Government clerk. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Borland amendment for the reason that it is unrepublican. It comes of a necessity made possible because of the unwillingness of the Democratic Party to adopt a tariff that would give to the country enough money to operate it. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is in line with the whole Democratic policy of unwillingness to provide and of theory. I was pleased a little while ago to see my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] standing up here and saying that he would like to see his side of the House bring out something that it was possible for him to vote for, and then I see our theoretical friend from New York [Mr. LONDON] charge that that side voted against the child-labor bill when he himself, in the beginning of this Congress, came in on the floor and took his stand and preference with the party that did that same thing, for he declared against the Republican tariff and his disbelief in it. [Applause on the Republican side.] Yet that Republican tariff stands as a bulwark against cheap, enslaved child-made materials coming from abroad. Let us be consistent. A very few minutes ago the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] stood on this floor and said that last year there were about 12 applicants for every position in the classified service, and yet if that gentleman turns back in history to six years ago he will find that instead of holding the examinations once per year they had to hold them many times during the year in order to keep the roll full to supply the demand. Men in the classified service quit it because they could do better outside; it was a Republican administration. That same thing will occur again after next year. [Applause on the Republican side.] Oh, yes; this beautiful theory of saving. We are going to make

7 per cent of the employees work 10 per cent longer time. Why not raise their hours to 10 because there are a number of them working now at 8? Does it follow that 8 hours is going to be the entire law of the land? Are there not plenty of people in the world working more than 8 hours? Why should they not come in immediately with another rider and provide that everybody must work 9 hours or 10 hours? There is no more law against it than there is for the 7-hour law. Eight hours has been obtained after much work on the part of the men who labored in the mills and in the factories. They have secured it, and now you want to strike back on it. Eight hours is but a point in the betterment of the condition of the working people. Time will show 7 hours and even 6 hours will be as much the rule and as strongly defended as 8 hours for work is now. Efficient service is the goal, not length of hours.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment before the committee does more than provide for an eight-hour day. If it only went that far, we might consistently support it, but when it provides for a reduction of 10 per cent of all of the employees in the departments of the Government, knowing, as we do, that in some of these departments, like the State Department, the Navy Department, the War Department, the Department of Commerce, clerks in certain bureaus during the past year have been working 8, 9, and 10 hours, it will be seen immediately that it will result in complete demoralization and disorder. No more revolutionary amendment has ever been brought into this House than this one that is now presented for consideration. No consideration whatsoever was given to it. I question whether any consideration was given to it by the proponent of the amendment. In voting for this amendment you would compel the clerks in the State Department, who have been overworked by reason of the European war, working 8, 9, and 10 hours a day, to work 14 per cent more, namely, 11 and 12 hours, and the result of that is going to be complete disorganization. That is supported by the hearings. Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, of the Navy Department, testified that clerk after clerk in various bureaus worked 9 and 10 hours a day, because of the stress of work in that department. Secretary Redfield testified that in his own office his clerks worked 9 or 10 hours a day.

In the State Department the officials and clerks have been working extra hours. Are you going by this character of hodgepodge amendment, in order to make it in order, providing for a horizontal reduction that has no justification or relevancy whatever to the service, to disorder and disorganize it so that these departments now will not be able to do their work? Last night after I left my office I walked down through the Mall and past the State, War, and Navy Building, and there I saw the War Department, with many of its offices lighted up, where, I assume, the clerks were engaged in working upon the critical condition that now confronts that department. The same condition confronts them in the Navy Department, where, in the Bureau of Operations recently constituted, they need every man, and you are going to compel them by this amendment to discharge some of the men. There is nothing scientific about this proposal when you direct that the heads of the departments shall mandatorily reduce the number of their men 10 per cent without regard to the amount of hours of work that are now being performed.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Is there any law requiring these Government clerks to work over eight hours a day?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is left——

Mr. GORDON. Answer the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Give me a chance to answer and I will. Under existing law the heads of departments are privileged to require them to work more than eight hours. They have that privilege, but when they do require them to work eight hours a day—I have the law in my hand—the clerks can not exact any extra compensation for that additional labor. And here we have these clerks in some of these departments working from 9 to 10 hours a day, and by your vote you are going to say that you will require them to work 11 and 12 hours a day in order to keep up with their work. Are you going to stultify yourself in order to follow the fetish of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to this Borland amendment for this reason: I think it is very illy considered, and I do not think it advisable that any such amendment as this should pass at this time. The purpose of the amendment is to remove 10 per cent of the employees out of the Government service without any regard to what department they are to be taken from and what duties they are performing; but the gentleman proposes just to take them out at random and turn them loose without consideration for past services. Now, I want to say this. I have found in my five years of experience here that these Government employees are a powerful nice set of folks. [Laughter and applause.] They are very accommodating and painstaking. Last night I was down at the Post Office Department at half past 5 o'clock, and I found many of these employees down there working away after the time for quitting. I also want to pay a special tribute to the Washington newspapers for their patriotic stand on this proposition. They have performed in their own estimation a very great public service in opposing this particular amendment. I very distinctly remember in 1914 and in the Sixty-second Congress, when the Committee on Labor, of which I had the honor of being a member, was trying to emancipate the poor girls and women of this District employed in the stores, that page after page and editorial after editorial filled the columns of the Washington papers protesting against the passage of an eight-hour law as applicable to these children and women; and I remember just the other day, when the street car strike was on here and these poor street car conductors and motormen were trying, not to get an eight-hour work day but eight hours in which to rest, that the Washington newspapers were conspicuous by their silence. [Applause.] So they performed a very patriotic duty in opposing the Borland amendment.

Now, I can not agree with my friend, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY]. This is the best-governed town in the United States for its size. There is not any doubt about that, and I congratulate every Member of Congress who helped to make this city the great and beautiful city it is. We ought to be proud of it. Now, as to the question of this eight-hour employment. A gentleman here, a very prominent Member on this floor, I think expressed the sentiment of most of the Members when he said that during the street-car strike a motorman asked him, "Are not you in favor of the labor union?" He said, "No; I am not." The motorman said, "Are not you in favor of the eight-hour day?" He replied, "No; I am not." He said, "I do not work but two hours per day and I am opposed to everybody else doing the same thing." [Applause.] Now, I can not see any necessity for making these Government clerks go down to the departments and just sit there and look at one another for eight hours a day unless they are needed for that length of time and perform some service. Now, my judgment about this thing is this: The whole Government service needs five things done, and that speedily, in compliance with the Baltimore platform, and I just told my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that is the last platform we had left, that we had used all the balance of them. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Now, just wait a minute, and you will not get so much comfort out of what I have just said. As I said, we had used all the balance of the planks building our Democratic house, the architecture of which looks good to the people of the whole country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, let us see what ought to be done, and this is just a mere suggestion in conformity with our formal declarations at Baltimore which we have kept faithfully so far. [Laughter on the Republican side.] This is what we need:

First. A readjustment in lower grades.

Second. The automatic promotion of the efficient from a fixed basis annually.

Third. The establishment of an impartial efficiency board in each department, alternating each year.

Fourth. A fixed tenure of seven years, providing for the readjustment of the efficient and the retirement of the inefficient and superannuated.

Fifth. The prevention of political influence upon heads of departments for the advancement of the undeserving over the deserving.

Sixth. The establishment of a board of appeals in the civil service to prevent injustices from being perpetrated upon the faithful who have no influence to prevent them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to notify me when I have consumed five minutes. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the great appropriation bills that Congress must pass every year. This bill makes provision for almost 16,000 specific salaries. It carries lump sums for the pay of thousands of other salaries. It appropriates almost $40,000,000 to carry on the executive business of the Government.

We should attempt nothing, I take it, in the passage of this bill that will show that we have not given the subject careful and deliberate consideration. A few years ago there was promulgated from the office of the President an order that took away from certain clerks in the Post Office Department the right of appeal to Members of Congress. That order was wrong. It has been revoked. This provision offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] goes further than that. It takes from the clerks, almost 30,000 of them, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, the right of a hearing; it takes from those clerks the right of a fair trial. I submit, gentlemen of the House, that when we make provision for the payment of these salaries we should do it like men. We should consider what we are doing. Here are 1,200 pages of hearings. There was not a question asked of a single person that appeared before the subcommittee that reported this bill as to what effect legislation of this kind would have. And yet, by this amendment, we say that, without a trial, without hearing, without a word of testimony, that 10 per cent of these clerks shall be dropped from the rolls and the remaining 90 per cent shall do all the work.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said a while ago that what these clerks needed was more esprit de corps. Does not the gentleman think that the 10 per cent would need esprit de "corpse"? [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this question has its serious side. This is a very big question that we are considering to-day, and we ought to consider it with the full force and effect that this legislation would have if it passed this House and passed Congress. Who knows that as a result of this legislation any executive department of the Government could drop 10 per cent of its clerks, or even 1 per cent of its clerks? I have information from several departments of the Government to the effect that their clerks are working more than seven hours a day, and that many are working eight hours a day. In the War Department, in the Navy Department, and in the Library of Congress the heads of the departments say to me that in many of the bureaus it is necessary for them to tell the clerks that they must quit work; that they work full eight hours per day.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GOOD. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to ask you a question right there.

Mr. GOOD. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, from my study of this subject, and I am satisfied the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] knows well, that the question of efficiency in the various departments of the Government is one of the great questions that will in the near future command the attention of Congress. We have provided by this bill for a bureau of efficiency, a new bureau, and have given that bureau $40,000 in order that it may send trained men to go into the executive departments of the Government and there prescribe efficient methods. But until we have in some way made, at least, a study of this subject we should not attempt to take from any single department of the Government 10 per cent of its clerks, or any of its clerks. If the departments could get along with 10 per cent less than the committee reporting this bill recommend then the committee has not done the right thing in reporting a bill containing 10 per cent more clerks than are necessary. The amendment is a reflection on the intelligence of the Appropriations Committee. I am unwilling to admit that I did not know what I, as a member of the committee, was doing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the tendency in every civilized community is to restrict or lessen the hours of labor by legislation, rather than to extend them. Congress in recent years has provided for eight-hour labor for certain female employees in the District of Columbia and forbidden further time. Two years ago, or three—possibly four years ago—we provided that post-office carriers and clerks should not be permitted to work more than eight hours a day unless they were paid extra for the extra hours. The existing law provides that Government clerks in Washington shall work not less than 7 hours and may be required by the head of the department to work 17 hours—any number that he chooses—and, under the law, if the department is behind with its work, it is the duty of the head of the department to require the clerks to work longer hours; so that, if this amendment goes into law, for the first time in the history of legislation in this country, or any other country, we shall have provided that certain employees shall work not less than eight hours and may be required to work more than eight hours without extra compensation. No legislative body, no set of humane men anywhere in the world has heretofore proposed such a thing as that.

Mr. BORLAND. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. No; I have not the time. I am coming to the gentleman now.

Mr. BORLAND. He need not come to the gentleman. He can come to the facts.

Mr. MANN. I always stick to the facts. The gentleman from Missouri talks time upon time, and I do not want his interruption taken out of my time, because I have got too good a thing on him that I want to give to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois refuses to yield.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Illinois can talk about personalities but not on facts.

Mr. MANN. This is a well-merited personality.

The CHAIRMAN. A gentleman can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. MANN. After all, it is not the quantity of work that is so important as is the quality of work. I have seen gentlemen work many hours in the day and not accomplish as much in real work as one who worked two or three hours. Government clerks must be accurate. If they be not accurate, they are discharged. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] who introduced the amendment could be discharged for lack of accuracy, he would be out of a job. [Laughter and applause.] When a man suffers from brain-fag by reason of long hours of work his work is worthless. That is the trouble with the gentleman from Missouri. Yesterday he offered an amendment, reported this morning, that left out two important words. Brain-fag! That was possibly excusable, having been hurriedly prepared several days in advance; but the amendment in the bill called the "Borland amendment" can not be said to have been hastily prepared. It reads, leaving out the unessential parts, that "the provisions of section 7 is amended." Brain-fag! [Laughter.] The gentleman was not accurate, or he would not have said "is" as applicable to the plural of "provisions." If a Government clerk did that, he would be discharged. [Laughter and applause.] We require accuracy; and if my genial friend from Missouri, instead of working overtime, will restrict his hours of labor to seven solid work hours he will not make foolish mistakes like that, which we tolerate here, but which we would not tolerate from employees. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for nine minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the first thing I want to do is to puncture the pretense of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], not puncture his personality, because that has no weight in this argument.

He complains that the law now says that the Government clerks shall work not less than 7 hours a day, but may work 17 hours a day if directed by the head of a department so to do; and I say that that law was put upon the statute books in 1898 by the gentleman's own party, and that is the law which he condemns. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If there is any law compelling or permitting the head of a department, without limit, to raise the time, it was not passed by this Congress or proposed by a present Member of Congress. We are amending a law that is on the statute books, and the gentleman well knows it. The law says that the clerks shall not work less than a certain number of hours, because the head of a department, exercising a discretion theretofore vested in him, apparently worked them less than seven hours. It became necessary for the gentleman's party, when the war with Spain broke out, in 1898, to provide that they should not be cut down to less than seven hours. That is the amendment of this legislation. Now, we are asking that they shall not cut them down to less than eight hours, leaving them precisely as the gentleman and his party has left them.

Now, as to their working overtime, that is all "bunk." There is no chronic condition of overtime work prevailing in the departments, and in all the arguments that have been made in behalf of the Government clerks no man has shown any such thing as overtime.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I will not yield. The gentleman has had his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BORLAND. The fact of the matter is that every deficiency bill and every appropriation bill relieves the condition of overtime whenever it is shown to exist, and this bill relieves the condition of overtime, temporary in character, known to exist in the Department of State.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to this matter. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, talking to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt, asked:

Mr. BYRNS. Are the clerks employed in the Navy Department up to a fair standard of efficiency?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. My own personal judgment is that they are up to a fair standard of efficiency personally, but that the hours of work in the Government service in Washington are altogether too short; they are much shorter than would be called for in any business in this country, when you come right down to it. Work in the Navy Department does not get under way much before 9 o'clock, a certain amount of time is taken out for lunch, and at 4.30 in the afternoon every clerk, practically—and I am speaking now as a general thing—is out of the building. The hours are short in the Government service.

Mr. BYRNS. I thought they were required to work until 4.30?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I said 4.30.

Mr. BYRNS. I thought you said 4 o'clock.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. As a matter of fact, work slacks up about 4.15.

Now, as a matter of fact, gentlemen, this matter has been before the Committee on Appropriations in so many forms and at so many times and in so many ways that the committee is constantly confronted with the question of reform in the administration of the departments in Washington. We are so constantly asked for an increase of clerks that we must find out, if possible, why the clerks that they already have are not doing the work. The American people to-day are asked why we have not a better Navy for the money we have spent on it, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] will tell them that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy says the clerks in the Navy do not work long enough, and therefore he came down here and took the side of the poor, overworked clerks. [Laughter.]

Now, it may interest some people in the House to know how the people outside the District look at this matter. I know how the people inside the District look at it. I see my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who never votes for the taxpayers, and my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT], the Republican Member who fought so vigorously against the child-labor bill in this House, lining up with the interested people in the District of Columbia to defeat a seven-hour labor day for the clerks. I have nothing against the clerks as a body. They are fairly decent fellows, in spite of the abusive letters that I have received from some of them. [Laughter.] They are no better than are the people at home, your constituents and mine, and they are no worse, but they are not entitled to a bit better treatment than your people are or mine.

Mr. Chairman, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read in my time a letter which I have received from the celebrated southern evangelist, Rev. Samuel W. Small.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHELBY, N. C., March 8, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Really do you not think it an unpardonable legislative sin to demand of the sheltered civil-service employees of the Government departments that they shall give the people a full day's work for a full day's pay?

What reward is there for taking an active interest in politics and rounding up one's relations back home for "the ticket" if a public pap feeder must also work a regulation eight-hour day like common independent laborers?

You do not seem to realize that many of the Government clerks have other employments "out of hours" in which they are collecting salaries, making wages, or acquiring profits. One of them runs a private dental establishment when not at his desk in the department. Others in the suburbs run market gardens, chicken ranches, and dog-breeding yards, and can not afford to render more than seven hours' service to Uncle Sam without imperiling their several and profitable businesses.

Others serve as clerks, bookkeepers, and stenographers to other employers after they get away from the grinding seven hours in the Government mills.

Of course, all Washington is up in arms against your amendment, and its defeat will open the door wider for a coming demand that all Government employees throughout the Nation be put upon a parity with "the most-favored class" in Washington and be given a seven-hour day—and who can deny them that justice? But I find in my constant travel in many States that the plain people think you are dead right in your demand, and they will certainly ask disagreeable questions of the Members who vote against your proposal when they get home.

Yours, faithfully,

SAM W. SMALL.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I place myself squarely upon two propositions. The first is that if eight hours is good enough for a man in the shop, and if it is good enough for the field employee in the great post offices in the United States, in the civil service, it is good enough for a man in the departments.

The second proposition is that the American taxpayer is entitled to a square deal. He must pay taxes to support the Government, but he is entitled to a fair and honest return for those taxes. Most American taxpayers must work eight hours a day or longer, and it is unjust to them to permit the employees in the departments in Washington to work only seven hours. Any Member of Congress who votes against this amendment is voting against these two propositions. It matters not what pretext he may give for his vote, he is in reality voting for discrimination, favoritism, and special privilege. He is voting for the financial interests of Washington and against efficiency and good government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Under the agreement of the committee all time has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to offer amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to ask if the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is divisible? Can we have a vote on the two propositions separately?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will examine the amendment to determine that question. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY moves to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"And provided further, That whenever it shall become necessary to effect such reduction by discharge or dismissal those who are least efficient shall be first separated from the service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to demand a division, if the amendment is divisible.

The CHAIRMAN. While the Chair is in some doubt, the Chair will hold that the amendment is one legislative proposition and is not divisible. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were—ayes 44, noes 176.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. In the opinion of the Chair, has the gentleman from Missouri been "showed"? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BORLAND offers the following amendment as a new paragraph on page 150:

"No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any executive department of the Government in the city of Washington which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment is subject to the point of order that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill, intended as a limitation, but changing existing law, and does not come within any of the exceptions contained in the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point of order, holding the amendment to be a limitation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. This amendment is subject to discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to call attention to another one of the inaccuracies of our genial friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], occasioned undoubtedly by the fact that he is working more than seven hours a day. In reply to what I said he just made the statement that the law now authorizing the head of a department to require a clerk to work more than seven hours a day was enacted in 1898. Now, the fact is that the law was enacted in 1893——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri is evidently working too many hours a day to be perfectly clear in his mind.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair at the moment was not listening to the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am sure the Chair will be edified and instructed if he does listen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is equally sure of that.

Mr. MANN. I do not blame the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] for objecting to my stating a fact on the floor, after himself dealing so freely in flights of fancy. The act to which the gentleman refers, that of 1898, was an act amending the act of 1893.

Mr. BORLAND. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the committee never holds anyone exactly to the rule, but that there is some latitude allowed in debate, and the Chair overrules the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether I am in order or not. I did not listen to the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, but I supposed it was one of these foolish amendments along the same line. [Laughter.] If it is upon another subject, I have no desire to be heard; and having shown that the gentleman's statement was entirely erroneous, I suggest to him that he concern himself hereafter to stating facts, and to working seven hours a day, for evidently his brain is not able to stand more. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND and Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this pending amendment is purely a limitation upon the appropriations carried in this bill. It is subject to the existing law, with the exceptions and provisions therein contained, which, of course, concede to the clerks all of their overtime, holidays, Saturday half holidays, sick time, and so on, and provides that no part of the appropriation shall be used except in departments maintaining an eight-hour schedule. The law, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] undertook to point out, permits the head of a department to require an eight-hour schedule, but that law has been a dead letter. It now depends upon Congress whether it wishes the departments to require an eight-hour schedule. If it does, here is a very plain way in which the limitation can be made upon these appropriation bills.

Possibly gentlemen have been scared by the bogey of wholesale discharges under the other amendment. It has been claimed here that 5,000 would be discharged. The gentleman from Kentucky said they could not discharge 5,000 Democrats, because there were not that many Democratic clerks in the departments. Possibly he is right about it. They could not discharge 5,000 at all, because the natural vacancies by death, resignation, and separation from the service are 8 per cent.

Mr. GORDON. Resignations!

Mr. BORLAND. So there would be a loss of 2 per cent by discharges.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the new amendment just proposed, there will be no necessary discharges of employees.

Mr. BORLAND. There will be no necessary discharges, but there might be very highly desirable ones. I have no doubt the service could be improved in every department by a certain number of judicious discharges. If eight hours is required, the number of discharges depends on the efficiency of the head of the department, entirely upon his volition in arranging the details and management of his own department. Every objection that has been raised outside of the pure fight for an eight-hour day is eliminated in the amendment. The gentlemen who voted against this will be voting against an eight-hour day and squarely against the taxpayers who are now working eight hours a day, if employed. I want to put this squarely before you.

There are two sides to this. One is the side of the American taxpayer, who pays the bills, and the other side is the Washington landlords and business men that get the money. A "no" vote will be on the side of the landlords and business men and a "yea" vote is a vote on the side of the American taxpayers' right for an honest return for his money. That is the whole idea, and man must take his side squarely on this amendment, and I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were 47 ayes and 165 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That all laws and parts of laws to the extent that they are inconsistent with this act are repealed.

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order against the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. A motion to recommit lies after the third reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes; just after the third reading. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Iowa against the bill?

Mr. GOOD. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Missouri against the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. I am.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to cross-examine my colleague from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated that he was against the bill. The rule provides that the minority shall have preference in recognition, provided he is qualified. A member of the committee has a prior right, and therefore the Chair recognizes him in preference to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

[Mr. MANN addressed the Chair. His remarks were afterwards ordered expunged from the RECORD.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that remark be expunged from the RECORD. I ask that the remarks be taken down and expunged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands that the words be taken down.

Mr. BORLAND. I claim that those words are in breach of the rules of the House, and I move that they be expunged from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words.

The Clerk read the words.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to expunge the words from the RECORD.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were—ayes 116, noes 121.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 156, answered "present" 10, not voting 86, as follows:

The name of Mr. BROWNING was called, and he answered, "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BORLAND moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment:

On page 150 add as a new paragraph the following:

"No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any executive department of the Government in the city of Washington which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 189, noes 4.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARMY EMERGENCY.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 180.

Resolved, etc., That when in the judgment of the President any emergency arises which makes it necessary, all organizations of the Army which are now below the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law, shall be raised forthwith to that strength, and shall be maintained at nearly as possible thereat, so long as the emergency shall continue: Provided, That the total enlisted strength of any of said arms of the service shall not include unassigned recruits therefor at depots or elsewhere, but such recruits shall at no time exceed by more than 5 per cent the total enlisted strength prescribed for such arm; and the enlisted men now or hereafter authorized by law for other branches of the military service shall be provided and maintained without any impairment of the enlisted strength prescribed for any of said arms.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman that he make some brief statement concerning the resolution. I shall not object.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to authorize the President to raise to maximum strength the present organizations of the Army. The reason for it is that the demand is very great from the citizens along our border for protection while the expedition is going into Mexico for the purpose of capturing Villa. Mayors of towns, chiefs of police, and prominent citizens have deluged the War Department with telegrams asking that the border shall not be left unprotected while the punitive expedition is going on.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Virginia state to the House how far below the maximum strength the regiments are now?

Mr. HAY. The regiments now, some of them, are at full strength. The ordinary skeleton strength of a regiment of Infantry is about 900 men. The full strength is 1,830 men. In order to raise the organizations of Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery to their full strength it is necessary to have over 100,000 men. The law now authorizes the President only to enlist in the Army 100,000 men. In order to have these organizations up to full strength he must have authorization for 19,947 men above the 100,000 now allowed by law.

As I say, the reason for this resolution is that it is immediately necessary that the border shall be protected while this expedition is going on, and in order to avoid calling out volunteers it was thought that this was the simplest plan and would give men enough and would not cause it to be believed that there was any disposition on the part of this Government to do more than that which they have declared their purpose to do, which is to punish Villa and his bandits for the outrages which they have committed.

If there is any other question that any gentleman wants to ask, I will be very glad to answer it.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. DIES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia why the National Guard, 129,000 men, that have patriotically tendered their services, is not available in this crisis?

Mr. HAY. Of course, they would be available if invasion was threatened and they all would want to go, but it would be an invidious thing to select some and refuse others. And this resolution has been worked out as the simplest plan by which to get the men. You would have to pay the National Guard just as much as you would have to pay these men, and when the emergency ceases the Army will be reduced to the strength now allowed by law.

Mr. DIES. That is just it. Would not the recruits to the Regular Army be untrained soldiers? And would not the National Guard, if you would call them out, be trained, with guns in their hands and ready for service?

Mr. HAY. I can hardly say as to that. But these recruits would be immediately put in commands which had in them trained men. In that way they would be trained very soon, and their duties would only be to patrol the border. It was thought inexpedient to call out the National Guard for the purpose of patrolling the border, especially as they could only be called as volunteers.

Mr. DIES. Do I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that these nineteen thousand odd soldiers would be dropped at the expiration of the Mexican trouble?

Mr. HAY. At the expiration of the emergency, yes; the Army would be reduced to the strength now allowed by law.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it possible or permissible under the Constitution to call out the National Guard for this purpose?

Mr. HAY. I suppose if there was any fear of invasion it would be. You can call out the National Guard to repel invasion, but I do not apprehend that there is any danger of it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that many National Guard organizations have volunteered to go in a body if they are required for Mexico?

Mr. HAY. I understand there is a very large number of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 236, noes 1.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 236, and the noes are 1, and the resolution is passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 4657. An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10490) entitled "An act to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 129):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, late a Senator from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Senator.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from Washington to South Bend, Ind., for burial, in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

That in compliance with the foregoing, the Vice President had appointed as said committee Mr. KERN, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. KENYON, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. JAMES, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of Senate joint resolution 37, to amend a joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States," approved May 12, 1898, which was referred by mistake to the Committee on Claims. I want it to be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we could not hear what it was.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a joint resolution providing for the adjustment of claims between the United States and the State of Tennessee for matters and transactions which grew out of the Civil War.

Mr. MANN. Well, reserving the right to object, I noticed the other day where the State of North Carolina had a bill to recompense its old war expenses, and the parliamentary clerk or the Speaker referred it to the Committee on War Claims, and then they changed it over to the Committee on Claims. I do not mean they changed it, but somebody did. Why is it? Is it because of the personnel of the committee in the one case and the jurisdiction over the subject matter in the other case?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know about the other case, but this case properly goes to the Committee on War Claims, because the contention of the State of Tennessee is that it was for property taken and used by the Government during the war.

Mr. MANN. During the war or after the war?

Mr. HOUSTON. Just after the war, for its use and occupation during the war.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think it is claims for property sold largely, at least, after the war. That is my recollection of it, although I could never get full information about it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The sale of the property was after the close of the war, but it was for use and occupation of the property during the war by the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the change of reference? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCKELLAR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the sugar bill and the antidumping legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LONDON. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the resolution that was adopted a few minutes ago.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects.

DEATH OF SENATOR SHIVELY, OF INDIANA.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 172.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That a committee of 20 Members be appointed, on the part of the House, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following committee:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARNHART, Mr. DIXON, Mr. ADAIR, Mr. COX, Mr. CULLOP, Mr. CLINE, Mr. MOSS of Indiana, Mr. RAUCH, Mr. GRAY of Indiana, Mr. MORRISON, Mr. LIEB, Mr. WOODS of Indiana, Mr. MOORES of Indiana, Mr. IGOE, Mr. TREADWAY, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. LAFEAN, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. DUNN, and Mr. TILSON.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the other resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly the House (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 15, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to this sacred moment of our day's work when in thought and aspiration we touch the boundaries of the great unseen and the eternal world and lift our hearts to the Father of our spirits. We remember in this moment one who has been called from the scenes of his earthly career into the great beyond, reverenced and respected by all who knew him, while those who came within the charmed circle of his personal influence held him in affection and friendship.

We bless Thee to-day for the high ideals that have been maintained in this honorable body through all its history, and by every man who closing his record here has left behind him the achievement of these ideals in his personal life and character.

Grant, we pray, to send to us to-day the influence and ministry that should come to us in an hour like this, remembering that we are passing along the same journey, serving the same great country, aspiring to the same high ideals. And we pray that Thou wilt lay Thy hand upon the heart and mind of every one of his colleagues remaining here in active service, inspiring them to the reconsecration of their lives to the interests of their country and to the honor and glory of the name of the God of our fathers.

Hear us in this our prayer. Chasten us with Thy holy spirit of truth. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR SHIVELY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels constrained to announce that last evening the Chair endeavored to secure a definite statement that the Senators named would attend the funeral of Senator SHIVELY. Owing to the suddenness of the death and the engagements of Senators, it was difficult to procure the promise of Senators who were old-time friends of Senator SHIVELY, and the Chair, without succeeding in getting definite promises, appointed the committee.

The Chair understands that the train will leave at 6.15 to-morrow night, and that the funeral will not take place until 2 o'clock Saturday afternoon in the city of South Bend. If, therefore, any of the Senators named by reason of any cause can not attend, the Chair would like to be notified as soon as possible in order that the committee may be filled up.

So long has been the personal friendship of the deceased Senator and the Vice President that the Chair will feel it his duty, as but a decent mark of courtesy for many years of personal friendship, that he should attend the funeral.

The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 12207. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution providing for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army in an emergency.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions of the House on the death of Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, late a Senator from the State of Indiana.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 12207. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

H. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution providing for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army in an emergency was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INCREASE OF ENLISTED MEN OF THE ARMY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Joint resolution 180 has come over from the House and has been by the Chair referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Permit me to say that the Committee on Military Affairs has considered it and has requested that I report back the joint resolution favorably. Therefore I report it back and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution by title.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, reports favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 180) providing for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army in an emergency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before its consideration——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask that the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That when, in the judgment of the President, an emergency arises which makes it necessary, all organizations of the Army which are now below the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law shall be raised forthwith to that strength, and shall be maintained as nearly as possible thereat so long as the emergency shall continue: Provided, That the total enlisted strength of any of said arms of the service shall not include unassigned recruits therefor at depots or elsewhere, but such recruits shall at no time exceed by more than 5 per cent the total enlisted strength prescribed for such arms; and the enlisted men now or hereafter authorized by law for other branches of the military service shall be provided and maintained without any impairment of the enlisted strength prescribed for any of said arms.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any objection to the joint resolution, but I want to look into it, and I ask that it go over to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not understand what the Senator from North Dakota said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be an objection on the part of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, if it is not going to be considered this morning, I desire to present an amendment to the joint resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I hope he will not object to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. It is quite urgent, and I think we could give him the information he wants in reference to it. The Committee on Military Affairs has given the joint resolution its careful consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the committee were unanimous.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee were unanimous. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that we had before us an engrossed copy of the joint resolution before it reached the Senate, and we considered it in the session this morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture an individual suggestion, that I trust the Senator from North Dakota will withdraw his objection and let the joint resolution be passed.

Mr. WARREN. I also hope the Senator may see his way to withdrawing his objection.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask the chairman of the committee what will be the increase in the Army providing the joint resolution is passed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How much will be the increase?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. About 20,000 men.

Mr. GRONNA. I heard the joint resolution read. I meant the percentage of increase.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The strength of the Army is a little more than 100,000, and this is to raise it to from 120,000 to 125,000 men. I will state to the Senator that the necessity arises along the border where the enlistments are expiring, and they have skeleton regiments and skeleton companies which they desire to fill up to the full strength.

Mr. GRONNA. I will state that I do not know that I have any objection to the provisions of the joint resolution, but I felt that I wanted some information. The information that the chairman of the committee has given me is sufficient, and I will withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided further, That the enlistments under this resolution shall be for only two years in the service with the organization of which those enlisting shall form a part, the balance of said enlistment to be on furlough and attached to the Army reserve, as provided in the act approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not press this amendment if it will cause delay or in any way embarrass prompt action upon the joint resolution. The present law provides for enlistment with the colors for four years. I believe the enlistments would be made much more quickly if the length of time were put at two years. I am very earnestly against a long-time enlistment with the colors.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to say to the Senator from Georgia that the provisions in regard to the period of enlistment is, I think, fully and satisfactorily embodied in the new bill which is about to be presented to the Senate for the reorganization of the Army. The bill deals with that subject, and I think its provisions will be acceptable to the Senator. I therefore suggest that he withdraw his amendment and allow the matter to come up in due course, which will be in a very few days.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The enlistment will really come under the new law proposed rather than under the old law?

Mr. DU PONT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not press the amendment now, because I am perfectly in sympathy with the immediate passage of the joint resolution; but I shall a little later on undertake to urge upon the Senate the view, and a very strong view, that I have against long-time enlistments. The real question is whether we are enlisting men to be permanent soldiers or whether they are to be temporary soldiers and while in the service be prepared to return to civil life.

I am against long-time enlistments. I am against enlistments that may contemplate making men permanent soldiers. I think we ought to take up under the general bill the question of preparing private soldiers while they are in the service for civil life on their return to civil life, and short-time enlistments are essential for such a course. In connection with their service as private soldiers a part of their time should be given to preparation for civil life. This view I shall endeavor to press upon the Senate a little later on.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, there is a great deal of merit in the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Georgia. I think it would be better if the enlistment to meet this emergency should be limited to one year. There is not a patriotic citizen of military age in this Republic who would not promptly offer his services to defend the flag and uphold the rights of his Government in a conflict with any nation on earth. But the average self-respecting, independent, liberty-loving young man will not join the Regular Army and subject himself to the servitude which that service imposes. Now, personally I am opposed to the enlargement of the permanent or standing Army at all. But I am very much in favor of this joint resolution. I have no idea that the services of the 20,000 additional soldiers will be needed to meet the exigencies of the situation on the Mexican border; but the President and the Secretary of War, out of an abundance of caution, probably, have asked for that number of men, and I shall cheerfully vote for the resolution. And I sincerely hope it may be promptly passed, for the reason that I think it will have a very excellent moral effect. But for the fact that the adoption of the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Georgia would necessitate returning the joint resolution to the House of Representatives, I should insist upon the consideration of it. But celerity and dispatch are important elements just now, and I hope that nothing will be done to delay the preparation being made for the campaign our Army is to begin on the border of Texas. Let the resolution go through at once, and whatever defects there may be in the system I trust we may be able to correct them at some future time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as a detached portion of the national defense has come up for consideration——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey will state his inquiry.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the joint resolution before the Senate or is there an objection pending? What is its status?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no objection pending to the present consideration of the joint resolution, and it is before the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was about to state that as a detached portion of the national defense has come up for consideration this morning I should like to say a few words regarding the broad treatment of this whole subject. By way of preliminary I will ask that the Secretary read an editorial from the Washington Post of Wednesday, March 15, 1916, entitled "Will Congress Push Defense Bills?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

WILL CONGRESS PUSH DEFENSE BILLS?

[From the Washington Post, Wednesday, Mar. 15, 1916.]

The confusion and delay in Congress on measures of national security are disquieting to the public. While some of the Congress committees have been working steadily on defense programs, others have palpably wasted time, and there has been no evidence whatever of cooperation in Congress looking to the enactment of comprehensive and coordinated legislation. The committees are working independently and in some cases at cross purposes. Their work will have to be done over again by Congress as a whole, unless financial considerations are to be cast to the winds. On the fundamental question of reconstructing the Army there is such wide difference that a long struggle between the two Houses seems to be inevitable.

The commendable efforts of committee chairmen to bring out early reports on defense measures should be seconded by generous cooperation among Senators and Members generally. They can afford to set aside pet measures for the sake of expediting the all-important work of making the country's defenses adequate. After three and a half months of committee work, Congress surely ought to be ready to consider defense bills. It must be ready soon if it is to deliberate wisely upon these measures before next autumn.

Emergency defense bills are making their appearance, as was to be expected. Some of them may have merit, but they are stop-gaps at best, and have little bearing upon the national defense problem as a whole. Patchwork legislation intended to make the present defense equipment workable is likely to do as much harm as good, by diverting legislators from really creative work. It is doubted in some quarters that Congress, in fact, will be able to devise and fill out a comprehensive and coherent system of national defense within a year or two. It is suggested that while urgent defense bills are being considered at this session, a joint committee of Congress be appointed to go deeply into the whole subject in all its bearings—military, naval, financial—and bring out a well-digested plan for defense that may be considered by Congress at its next session.

Unless immediate steps are taken by the committees and by Congress as a whole, this plan will win many advocates, for the reason that Congress will have proved itself unable, through its system of unrelated committees, to bring forth a comprehensive plan on this complex subject within a reasonable time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, about a month ago I offered in the Senate joint resolution No. 91 providing for a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives to investigate the conditions relating to the national defense and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee. Immediately after offering it, I appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and urged the adoption of the resolution. The resolution appeared in full in the RECORD of day before yesterday, and I will not now read it, but it requires a report from this joint subcommittee upon all the material aspects of the national defense.

I wish to preface my remarks by saying that it is with some hesitation—with great hesitation, I may say—that I venture at all to say anything upon the subject of military and naval affairs, for I do not profess to be familiar with them. I have never served on committees relating to the subject, and profess to have no special information regarding it; but it has seemed to me that, owing to extraordinary conditions both in Europe and on this continent, it is of the highest importance that we should consider the national defense as a whole, and not simply consider detached portions; that not only Congress but the people themselves require knowledge upon the general proportions and cost of the entire scheme of national defense, and that to take up detached portions of the national defense, instead of taking hold of the subject broadly, is a mistake both from the standpoint of Congress and of the public at large.

Mr. President, I realize how painstaking the work of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has been, and I realize how strenuously the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has applied himself to this subject. I have no doubt that the Committee on Naval Affairs has applied itself to the special matter under its jurisdiction with equal assiduity, and I have no comment or criticism to make regarding the thoroughness of their work or the speed with which it is being accomplished; but it does seem to me that both Congress and the country require the presentation of some coordinated scheme of national defense that will embrace every detail, and that the best way of approaching this matter would be to have the whole subject considered now by a subcommittee composed of three from each one of the five committees having jurisdiction over detached portions of our military and naval defense—the Military and Naval Committees of the Senate, the Military and Naval Committees of the House of Representatives, and the Subcommittee on Fortifications in the other House.

The attention of Congress and the country would then be focused upon one recommendation, or, at the most, two, a minority and a majority report.

Their report should cover the general subject of the national defense, the efficiency of the present organization of the Army and Navy, the advisability of universal service, the relation of the State militia to the national defense, the increase in the Army and naval schools for training officers, the utilization for this purpose of the land-grant schools of agriculture and the mechanic arts, the creation of an auxiliary navy, useful in aid of the fighting ships in time of war and useful in time of peace in the development of new routes of commerce.

The report should also cover the necessary cost, covering a period of five years, including such organization of both Army and Navy as will be covered by an annual expenditure of $300,000,000, $350,000,000, $400,000,000, and so on.

It would be quite possible by a system of governmental aid for the establishment of vocational schools in cooperation with the States to create a military service extending over a period of years, during which young men would be trained in vocations that would be useful and at the same time in military discipline, with the obligation for a few years after their graduation to respond to the country's call and to gather together for a month or two in each year for the continuation and perfection of their military training.

Such a service would be regarded as one of honor and distinction, as helpful in preparation for future vocations, and as a steppingstone to advancement in the vocations of civil life.

These are the days of efficiency, and there is no organization in the country that needs methods of efficiency more than the Congress of the United States.

In reply to this suggestion urged by me a few days since, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], indicated that this plan had advantages; but he stated that he thought it too late to apply it to matters now under consideration; that all of the committees had either made reports or were prepared to make reports, and he thought the work should go on in the usual manner at this session of Congress, supplementing that work by the organization later on of such a subcommittee as I have in contemplation, with instructions to report at the next session. The chairman of the committee, therefore, as I understand, realizes the value of this coordinated work. He simply wishes to postpone it until later on.

Mr. President, I should like particularly to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if I may. I wish to present to the Senator this consideration: Whilst we all realize the value of the work that his committee has done and the value of the work of the Naval Committee, yet, if this coordination is important, is it not better to have it now and will it not proceed in a more orderly manner after the investigation has been made by these various committees having jurisdiction over detached portions of the national defense? As I understand, they are prepared to present their views. Why not, then, appoint this subcommittee and have all those bills go to this subcommittee?

This subcommittee, recollect, will be composed of members of all of these five committees. The appointment of a subcommittee is the commonest practice in legislation. This means simply a joint subcommittee of all the Military and Naval Committees of the House and Senate, instead of a subcommittee of the Senate. It means a subcommittee of five committees instead of a subcommittee of one committee. The regular committees will not lose jurisdiction of the subject, for as soon as the joint subcommittee reports its recommendation to the general committees of both the Senate and the House, their jurisdiction attaches, and they will address themselves to that recommendation.

It seems to me that the logical time to take hold of this question of coordination is after the committees have severally considered these questions—after they have informed themselves upon the subject—each committee applying itself intelligently to the subject within its jurisdiction, and therefore in the joint subcommittee being prepared to present the relation of that particular service which such committee represents to the general subject of the national defense.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that even if a general plan ought to be developed, a comprehensive plan, or, to use the Senator's own expression, a "coordinated" plan—and I want to say by way of parenthesis that I think of course there ought to be a general plan, and of course each part of that plan ought to fit into every other part of the plan—but even conceding that to be true, have we not the situation presented here this morning that we absolutely know that there is an immediate necessity for some increase in the Army; that we know we are going to need that number of men in any plan which may be adopted; and that when we have raised the Army to that amount it necessarily will fit into any larger plan? So are we not in the position of a man who knows that he is going to need a large amount of supplies to carry him through the winter, and therefore is perfectly safe in laying in a side of bacon and a sack of flour?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there is much in what the Senator suggests, but I submit to him that if this joint subcommittee is immediately appointed the urgency and significance of that situation will immediately address itself to that subcommittee, and they will immediately report upon that detached portion of the national defense which requires immediate attention.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, a subcommittee that proposes to act, and will act, immediately will have no more information than the Senate has if it acts immediately. The value of consideration by a subcommittee consists in the fact that it takes an entire plan, studies each part of it, and then passes upon each part. This being a part thereof, it could not be given any wise consideration by a committee in connection with a general plan until it had considered the whole plan. So that when the Senator states that he is willing to turn this question over to a subcommittee and have an immediate report, he confesses that he is willing to have a report made without considering a general plan.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to answer the Senator from Missouri, then I will gladly yield.

Mr. President, I would expect the proposed subcommittee immediately to consider those matters which require urgent attention. Among them, I presume, would be the increase of the Regular Army. There is no reason why they should not report that immediately. I would expect them, of course, in their preliminary considerations to address themselves to the question of a general plan of national defense, embracing a national council of defense, composed of both Army and Navy officers, and perhaps of departmental chiefs and chairmen of prominent committees; but they could easily determine whether detached action upon a detached portion of the subject would be likely to conflict in any way with the full consideration of a general measure, and, without coming to any conclusion as to the general measure, they could easily report as to the detached portion which required immediate attention. I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether he is now advocating the postponement of action upon the pending resolution until the subject can be considered by such a committee, as he has indicated?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I am not opposing immediate action upon this resolution. On the contrary, I favor it. I am simply making general suggestions now with reference to the method that should hereafter be pursued. I do not propose, of course, to attempt to obstruct any legislation upon this subject that is recommended by the committees; but I simply suggest that we will save time—and we will find that we will save time—by the appointment of a subcommittee now, instead of deferring until after the national-defense bills are passed, the consideration through a subcommittee of the general question. That seems perfectly clear to me. The appointment of this subcommittee, recollect, will not delay the action of the general committees. It does not take the place of their functions; it is simply in aid of their functions; and whenever a general committee regards a matter as of sufficient importance and urgency to press it upon Congress, it can do so, and the Congress can determine whether or not the matter is of such urgency as to require immediate attention or whether it can safely await the general report upon the subject.

All I contend is that, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs having said the other day that he thought that this plan of inquiry through a joint subcommittee would be a good one as applied to legislation subsequent to legislation at this session, and that it would be a wise thing to provide for it, I simply beg to differ with him as to that detail, though with great diffidence, for I acknowledge his superior information on the subject, and to urge that a joint subcommittee should be appointed now, and, even if we act from now on upon the recommendation of joint committees, that the subcommittee be in session, so that before we close our work upon the military and naval bill they can present us a coordinate scheme of legislation that will indicate to the American people exactly the proportions of the Army, exactly the proportions of the Navy, their relation to each other, and the cost of both. As it is, we are entirely at sea, and we will find that Members, both of the Senate and of the House, will be reluctant to act and to vote upon these detached portions, for the reason that they do not know where their action will land them as to the ultimate cost of this great expansion. So I suggest to the Senator from Oregon, entertaining the view he does, that at some time when this subcommittee should be appointed he bring the matter up before the committee, and I urge upon him a report favoring the appointment of a subcommittee now, but without, of course, ousting the jurisdiction of the general committees upon this subject in such a way as to prevent them from acting upon any matter of emergency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for the purpose of demonstrating and emphasizing the fact that there are no political or other differences in this Chamber when the interests of the country are at stake, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERN (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on official business of the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], but I am informed that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. If the Senator from Florida were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent on account of important business. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I am confident that if my colleague were present he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], but upon inquiry I am confident that if present he would vote "yea." I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent, but on this question I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Believing that my pair, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], if he were here would vote as I shall vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If my colleague were here he would vote as the junior Senator from Missouri has voted. I am paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]; but knowing that he would vote as I shall, I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on official business. If he were present I am sure he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Being assured that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a pair, would vote as I am about to vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. The junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is unavoidably detained by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. If the Senator from Maine were present, he would vote "yea," and I understand that is likewise the case with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. BORAH. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BRADY] is absent on account of illness and is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote he would vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. In his absense I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and will vote. I vote "yea." I also wish to state that my colleague [Mr. COLT], who is necessarily absent, would, if present, vote for this resolution.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] is paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—years 69, nays 0, as follows:

YEAS—69.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Myers	Smoot
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sterling
Beckham	Hollis	Newlands	Stone

Colt	Lodge	Ransdell

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am glad that we had the opportunity of a yea-and-nay vote upon this joint resolution, in order that the Senate might show to the country and to the world that while as guardians of the national welfare we will do everything in our power to preserve the peace of the country and to refrain from doing anything on our own part that would unnecessarily precipitate a conflict with any country in the world, yet when conditions do arise when it becomes necessary for the American people to protect the lives of our citizens and to punish those who would wantonly kill them, or to protect them in their just rights, this Nation and this Congress stand as one man, undivided, in defense of such rights and in its purpose to uphold them with whatever force is necessary everywhere throughout the world.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I present resolutions in the nature of a petition adopted by the Flathead Settlers' Association of Big Arm, Mont., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Flathead Settlers' Association, Big Arm, Mont., special meeting, March 8, 1916.

To Hon. HENRY L. MYERS and
Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
Senators in Congress from Montana.

SIRS: We respectfully urge that you use your best efforts to secure the final passage in its present form of Senate bill 1059, relating to the appraisement of homestead lands on the Flathead Reservation made by the classification commission of 1912 and 1913.

Also, many of our settlers are vitally interested in lines 3 to 12, on page 26, of the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385) relating to sparsely timbered lands on the Flathead Reservation. We ask your best efforts to secure its final enactment, with the following amendments:

(1) The insertion of the words "or grazing" between the words "horticultural" and "purposes," in line 4, page 26 of same, and the striking out of the word "or" after "agricultural."

(2) That the following provision be added after line 12 on page 26 of said bill:

"That qualified persons who have heretofore applied for or settled upon such timbered lands, or who have entered or settled upon adjoining lands, and have made proper homestead application for such lands, shall not be required to pay more for said lands than the highest amount specified by the Flathead Commission of 1907 and 1908 for lands therein of like character and similar classification."

We voice the sentiment of the valley and all the settlers in distress over their land applications, by urging your very best efforts in our behalf to make these provisions into law at this session.

Yours, very truly,

FLATHEAD SETTLERS' ASSOCIATION,
W. H. HOWE, Chairman,
JOHN MCGRANN, Secretary,
CHAS. E. TREKELL,
Committee on Resolutions.

BIG ARM, MONT., March 8, 1916.

Mr. MYERS. I present the petition of Chester W. Howe, of Montana, praying for an adequate appropriation for the Flathead reclamation project in that State. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

To the PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As one of the unit holders occupying land within the Flathead project, I desire to submit for your consideration the following:

At the invitation of the Government I entered upon an irrigable unit embraced in the Flathead project, under promise by the Government that my land would be irrigated either in whole or in part, and after more than five years of watchful and patient waiting this project is now about 25 per cent completed, and as a result of the Government's failure to carry out its express and implied pledges made to us at the time we made entry many of the unit holders have been compelled to temporarily or permanently abandon their homes.

We maintain that the treatment accorded to us has been very unfair and not in harmony with the promises made us when we settled upon these arid lands, and we can see no good reason for the Government's procrastinating methods in dealing with this project up to this time. It is to the interest of both the Indian and white man that this project and all other good laws be prosecuted more vigorously, and the lands will amply stand for all construction and maintenance charges, provided the work is carried on in an economical and business-like manner.

All funds expended in connection with the project are reimbursable either to the Indian or the Government, and the sooner this reclamation scheme is completed the sooner the Indian will be reimbursed for the money he has invested on account of same.

In view of the foregoing facts I respectfully request that Congress grant an appropriation for at least a million dollars for construction work on this project during the ensuing year.

Respectfully submitted.

CHESTER W. HOWE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Howard County, Nebr., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented petitions of sundry citizens of Delaware, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented memorials of sundry citizens of Texas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Texas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to make Sunday a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Dumas, Ark., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of sundry citizens of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of North Dakota, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Nome-Seward Peninsula Chamber of Commerce, Nome, Alaska, praying for the adoption of certain changes in the postal regulations relating to Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Division No. 54, Order of Railroad Telegraphers, of Deisem, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to limit the hours of service of telegraph operators on railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LANE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of Charles C. Sturtevant and 28 other citizens, and of the congregation of the First Congregational Church of Keene, in the State of New Hampshire; of the congregation of St. Jerome's Total Abstinence Beneficial Society, of Holyoke, Mass.; and of Walter S. Wright and 20 other citizens, of Newtown, Pa., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Maud Hartnett, Beatrice Plantier, Elizabeth Hickey, and Mary Holman, all of Keene, in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CLAPP presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Brainerd, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed repeal or modification of the so-called seamen's law, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Institute of Fine Arts, of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the erection of a central heating, lighting, and power plant on the banks of the Potomac River in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Commercial Club of Mankato, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the so-called mixed-flour law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ASHURST. I present resolutions adopted by the Democratic State committee of Arizona, assembled in Phoenix on the 4th instant, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution proposed by Mrs. F. C. Struckmeyer, of Phoenix, third vice chairman of the Maricopa County Democratic Club, representing the Arizona Congressional Union for Woman Suffrage.

Resolved, That we, the Democratic State Committee of Arizona, assembled in Phoenix this 4th day of March, 1916, in response to the desires of the women voters of our State, urge Congress to pass forthwith on to the legislatures of the several States for ratification the Susan B. Anthony amendment, known in this Congress as the Sutherland-Mondell resolution. We recommend this action in no spirit of party advantage, but solely with the desire that the women of America may be placed on the same political plane as the men of the Nation, and because we recognize that it is unwise to delay longer the establishment of equality between the women of the East and West.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to President Woodrow Wilson; Speaker CHAMP CLARK; Senator KERN, majority leader in the Senate; Representative KITCHIN, majority leader in the House; Representative HENRY, chairman of the Rules Committee of the House; Representative WEBB, chairman of the Judiciary Committee; and to the entire Congress, through the Arizona congressional delegation, to be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senators ASHURST or SMITH of Arizona in the Senate and by Representative HAYDEN in the House.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of sundry citizens of Seattle, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the naturalization of married women, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Hillsdale and Glenwood, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to make Sunday a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Anti-Tuberculosis Society of Grand Rapids, Mich., and a petition of the Anti-Tuberculosis Society of Saginaw, Mich., praying for an investigation into the conditions surrounding the marketing of dairy products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch, Federation of Women's Missionary Associations, of Ann Arbor, Mich., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Stable and Garage Employees Union, of San Francisco, praying for the printing of the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Peacemakers' Committee of Pacific Coast Churches, of Los Angeles, Cal., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present a petition of the Commercial Club of Oacoma, S. Dak., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas the last session of the Dakota Legislature adopted house joint resolution No. 6 memorializing Congress and our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means at their command to compel the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. to construct a permanent railway bridge across the Missouri River at the city of Chamberlain, S. Dak.; and

Whereas the conditions stated in said joint resolution existed at that time and still continue to exist; and

Whereas, pursuant to the instructions of said joint resolution, the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of South Dakota, Hon. HARRY L. GANDY, has introduced in the House of Representatives a bill which will, if passed, compel the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. to commence actual construction of a permanent bridge across the Missouri River between the counties of Brule and Lyman at some point at or near the city of Chamberlain, D. Dak., within one year from the date of its passage and approval; and

Whereas the welfare and development of this section of the State is dependent to a large extent upon the erection of such a bridge: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Commercial Club of the town of Oacoma, in Lyman County, S. Dak., That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America be, and they are hereby, urged to take prompt action upon said bill and pass it at the earliest possible moment; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senate and House of Representatives of Congress and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Done at Oacoma, S. Dak., this 28th day of February, 1916, by the Commercial Club.

THE OACOMA COMMERCIAL CLUB,
By T. B. STRONG, President,
By M. Q. SHARPE, Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present a petition of the Merchants' Association, of Watertown, S. Dak., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATERTOWN, S. DAK., February 15, 1916.

Hon. E. S. JOHNSON, Yankton, S. Dak.

DEAR SIR: The Merchants' Association of Watertown, S. Dak., in general meeting assembled, February 8, 1916, passed the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the Merchants' Association of Watertown, S. Dak., That we recognize the need for and do favor the passage of the proposed law for the control of retail prices on manufactured articles, known as the Stevens bill, H. R. 13305, now before Congress; and this association does hereby indorse the said proposed law, and does urge and request our Representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to assist in the passage of said law, and that our members shall each use his best effort to assist and support our Representatives in their action on this matter."

Watertown, S. Dak., February 8, 1916.

MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF WATERTOWN, S. DAK.,
By JOHN MOREY, Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 5078) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act; and

A bill (S. 5079) to amend section 6 of an act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes, approved March 14, 1900, as amended by the acts of March 4, 1907, and March 2, 1911; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senate has recently passed a bill recognizing within a few years the ability of the Philippine people for self-government. This implies necessarily a transfer of sovereignty now in the United States to the Philippine people. I am opposed to such a measure. It, however, has passed this Senate. The people of those islands have been led by the declared purpose of this measure to expect within the time named complete self-government and the assumption of sovereignty. The United States, whether wisely or unwisely, must accept the consequences resulting from the bill. If we retrace our steps it will produce widespread discontent among the Filipinos. If we adhere to the declared purpose we must accept our relinquishment of power and consequently ought no longer be charged with full responsibility for the protection or control of the islands.

The Philippine Scouts remaining in the islands are 5,755. They are natives but have been trained by United States officers. There is in addition a native constabulary for the preservation of public order and for local purposes incident to that service. The 11,991 enlisted men and 520 officers of the Regular Army of the United States are paid and maintained by our Government. The Philippine Scouts are also maintained and paid in like manner, I am informed. If conditions are at all within bounds as described here by the Senators who supported the bill, the Filipinos ought to be able, with the scouts, the constabulary named, and such native forces as a potential self-governing people can supply, to police the islands, maintain order, and adequately protect life and property without the further presence of the officers and troops proposed to be withdrawn by this resolution.

A people that within the period contemplated in Senate bill 381 is to assume complete sovereignty, exercise the right of self-government, and become an independent nation ought to be given a probationary time to demonstrate their fitness for such responsibility. If the experiment should fail before the United States has completely relinquished its sovereignty and surrendered entire possession of the islands, this Government can repair the error with much less difficulty and misunderstanding among all concerned. It is with this view that I am induced to make the proposal embodied in the joint resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 115) authorizing the withdrawal of United States troops from the Philippines was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Whereas the United States Senate did, on February 4, 1916, pass an act (S. 381) establishing the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, wherein the President is "authorized and directed to withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty now existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippines"; and

Whereas the independence of said Philippines is fully recognized in said bill as a separate and self-governing nation and such transfer of possession, sovereignty, and governmental control shall be completed and become absolute in not less than two years nor more than four years from the date of the approval of the act; and

Whereas full power to take the several steps necessary to institute such government is conferred upon the Philippines by the aforesaid bill, thus granting to them the opportunity of complete rights of civil government and indicating confidence in their ability to govern themselves; and

Whereas there are now stationed in the Philippine Islands 520 officers and 11,991 enlisted men of the Regular Army of the United States, who are maintained there at an annual expense of $1,814,095 in excess of the maintenance cost of these same troops in the United States; and

Whereas these troops are acclimated and thoroughly seasoned for a rigorous campaign in a tropical country, and if the reasons and alleged conditions which led to the passage of the aforesaid bill are well founded, their presence is no longer necessary for the maintenance of civil government in the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas there will remain in the Philippine Islands a force of 5,755 native scouts, which may be supplemented, if necessary, by native forces so as to exercise some of the rights of self-government under the guidance and protection of the United States; and

Whereas there appears to be an inadequate force of United States troops for the proper protection of American life and property on the Mexican border, with the result that repeated violations by bands of murderers from Mexican territory of the rights of American citizens within the territorial limits of the United States have occurred without their apprehension so as to provide for the future safety of our border: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the Philippine Islands with such dispatch as may be practicable all officers and enlisted men of the United States Army.

PENSIONS TO INDIAN WAR VETERANS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 655) to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $22,500 for repairing Government (Engineers) bridge over the Kansas River on the Fort Riley Military Reservation in Kansas, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for the repair, rebuilding, and completion of the macadam road on the Fort Riley Military Reservation, Kans., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WATER-POWER SITES.

Mr. NORRIS submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR SHIVELY.

Mr. KERN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 130), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee subsequently said:

From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment the resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] this day providing for the funeral expenses of the late Senator SHIVELY.

Mr. KERN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In pursuance of the notice I gave on yesterday, I submit a resolution proposing an amendment to the rules, and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 131) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and they hereby are, amended as follows:

At the close of Rule XXII add:

"Provided, however, If 32 Senators present to the Senate before the reports of standing and select committees provided for in the order of business during the morning hours a signed motion to bring to a close the debate upon a bill which is the unfinished business, thereupon at the hour of 2 o'clock the Chair shall, without debate, put the question to the Senate:

"Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate should be brought to a close?

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote, then said bill shall be in order to the exclusion of all other business.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour on the bill, the amendments thereto and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Chair to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Until the bill is disposed of no dilatory motion shall be in order, and appeals from the decision of the Chair shall be decided without debate."

COMMITTEE ON FLOOD CONTROL.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Pursuant to my notice of yesterday, I submit a resolution proposing an amendment to the rules, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 132) was referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they hereby are, amended as follows:

Amend Rule XXV by inserting, after the paragraph reading as follows:

"A Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, to consist of 5 Senators,"

The following paragraph:

"A Committee on Flood Control, to consist of 17 Senators."

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to state that to-morrow, March 16, 1916, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I propose to address the Senate on the armor-plant bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on yesterday I gave notice that upon the conclusion of the routine morning business to-day I would address the Senate briefly on the subject of the armor-plant bill. I wish now to state that I will not consume the time of the Senate during the morning hour, but that if I can secure recognition immediately after the hour of 2 o'clock to-day I will make my brief speech.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, March 21, 1916, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate in opposition to the armor-plant bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 562.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved January 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on yesterday I objected to the passage at that time of section 2 of the bill now under consideration. I stated my reasons at that time for desiring that the bill be not passed in its present form and at that time. I particularly wanted an opportunity to examine the bill to ascertain what its practical workings might be.

I adhere to the view that everything ought to be done to concentrate in the Federal reserve banks all moneys for which the Federal Government is in any way responsible; this to the end of strengthening the Federal Reserve System. Upon examination as to the practical effect of this bill, however, I am convinced that the advantages accruing through the greater latitude that will be permitted to the postal authorities will more than overbalance such disadvantages as may come from a withdrawal of some of the funds that otherwise might go into the Federal reserve banks. I am further informed, and I think reliably, that many of the Federal reserve banks have declined to receive the deposits from the postal savings banks because of the high rate of interest the Government exacts. Therefore, balancing one advantage against the other advantage, I think I should say to the Senate that, as far as I am concerned, I shall make no further opposition to the adoption of section 2.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on a former occasion I made opposition to some features which are incorporated in this bill, especially regarding the amount that an individual could deposit; but I have no disposition to renew the opposition to the provisions of the bill in that regard.

I desire to say, however, that, in my opinion, it is unfortunate that so much matter has been added to this bill that has no relation whatever to the Postal Savings System. The statute now in force which was approved June 25, 1910, relates exclusively to the Postal Savings System. The amendment that was made to that bill September 23, 1914, likewise relates exclusively to that system.

Mr. President, I think it unfortunate that we should put on the statute books a bill relating to this important subject and have it complicated with legislation that has no relation whatever to the subject matter we are considering. The provisions of this bill are duplicated to a large extent in the Post Office appropriation bill, which is before us. Of course those provisions can be stricken from that bill, but it seems to me they are much more appropriate on that bill than they are in this bill. It would be still more appropriate to bring in this extraneous matter in a separate bill, which might have been done, and probably passed without any objection, and then we would have had on the statute books, as we have now, a law relating exclusively to this one subject, so that when we wanted to ascertain anything about the matter we could turn to the statute and find exactly the provisions of the law.

As now proposed, if we pass this bill we will have a statute relating to the Postal Savings System with provisions relating to the postal clerks, the weighing of mails, contracts for carrying the mails, star routes, compensation of postmasters, and various other provisions of a general nature. As already suggested, all such provisions should have been incorporated in a separate bill.

Mr. President, I simply wanted to say that I think it was unfortunate to prepare the bill in the form it now is, but if the Senator from Alabama feels, as I apprehend he does, that this is the most expeditious way to get the legislation, possibly the best way under existing conditions, I shall interpose no objection beyond stating my view as to the form in which I think the bill ought to have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am inclined to agree with much that the Senator from New Hampshire has said; but it is far better to put these provisions in this bill than on an appropriation bill. That was the reason mainly that the bill was drawn in the form that it is. I do not think it complicates the postal savings bank bill in any way whatever.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, it was also done because the Postmaster General insisted that there were urgent reasons for immediate action.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood that to be the case.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said will be agreed to by almost anyone, that the injection of foreign matter into a bill which is special in its character is, generally speaking, unjustifiable. I think it is just as unjustifiable when passed in an appropriation bill as it is in a case of this kind.

The fact is that the Post Office Department has not had any general legislation of an administrative character since the 4th of March, 1913. These matters which have been pending and have been considered by committees have been parts of bills. They are unobjectionable in themselves, and they ought to be adopted to enable the department to carry on its routine business. It seemed to the committee for that reason that this is the time, the expeditious time, for action, in order to give the department a free hand in the conduct of the post-office business.

There is one matter, however, about which I wish to say a word, not on one of the amendments to the bill but the bill itself. Undoubtedly there were sound reasons for the passage of the postal savings bank bill. It was supposed to be true, and has been demonstrated to be true, that there would be a very considerable amount of money hoarded, largely because people of foreign extraction who had not been long in this country and who had been familiar with Government banks did not feel secure in putting their money in banks which we had established. It has been demonstrated that that is true, because the sending of money to foreign countries to be deposited in Government banks has very greatly decreased since the passage of the postal savings bank bill.

I think myself that in every way the law has justified itself and is working well. Some $80,000,000 are now deposited in postal savings banks, redeposited in local banks, and therefore going into circulation for the benefit of the communities where the money belongs instead of very largely being sent to foreign countries, as was done in the past.

But this bill goes further in the direction of postal savings banks or any bank which is essentially a savings bank than I believe is justified. It gets into the area of paternalism pure and simple. I am not opposed to some reasonable extension of the original law. If under some conditions the depositor wishes to deposit $1,000, I do not think that is unreasonable; but when we provide that $1,000 may be deposited bearing interest and another $1,000 not bearing interest, it practically provides that any person who wants to have the Government become the guardian of his money temporarily may deposit it in a post office and the Government is responsible for that money. In a week or two weeks or three weeks the man may wish to use it, and he simply makes the Government responsible for his funds instead of depositing it in a bank. That is not the duty of a savings bank; neither is it the province of a real savings bank to receive deposits aggregating $2,000. In the State of Massachusetts the limit of deposits which may be placed in a savings bank, including interest, is $1,600; and no man who has $1,000 to deposit could get a savings bank—for instance, in the city of Boston—to take it and care for it, because the answer would be to that inquirer for a place to put his money, "If you have $1,000, you are probably as competent to invest your money as are the officers of this bank."

It is not the province of a savings bank to take considerable sums of money from individuals. When you get into that area you are making a purely paternalistic measure of this, and I think for that reason it is undesirable that the law should be extended as far as it is provided in this bill.

I wish to say frankly that I did not succeed in convincing the Post Office Committee that my views should obtain. Very largely the committee were opposed to the conclusions to which I have come, but I have sought this opportunity to briefly state them, because I think it is a wrong tendency in government, and I do not think it was the original purpose of those who had a part in the postal savings bank legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator takes his seat——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Like many other Senators I had no opportunity to examine the bill before it was called up. I wish to ask the Senator in reference to a provision, I think, in section 2, where in effect it is provided that money shall be deposited in all cases in banks that belong to the Federal Reserve System, unless in towns where there are no such banks.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; that is the provision.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator why that limitation is made.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I prefer to have the chairman of the committee answer an inquiry of that kind, but I will say, from my own standpoint, that it is the duty of the Government to do business with its own agents. All national banks, all of which are members of the Federal Reserve System, are its agents under the law. This amendment provides that where there are no agents of the National Government in a town or community the money may be deposited in a State bank or trust company, provided there is such a bank located there. That is in accord with good administration, in my judgment. A community may be located 25 or 30 or 40 miles from any place where there is a national bank or a member bank of the reserve system. There may be a considerable deposit made in the post office of that community. It is necessary for the postmaster under the present law to send that money to a town where the member bank of the Federal Reserve System is located or to put the money in his own safe. The safe provisions in post offices are not in any sense secure. In many small post offices there are no safes. The Government is responsible for the money, and there is no safe place to put it. Furthermore, if the money is sent to another town or another community, it gets away from the original idea of the law that the money should be redeposited in the local community. The State bank must give security for that money, as would be done in the case of a deposit with any other bank. Therefore it seems to me wise and reasonable that it should be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator got the point of my objection. I am not complaining that the law provides that it can be deposited in a State bank where there is no member bank, but this provides, in substance, as I understand it, that in cases where there are both kinds of banks, State and National, the deposit must always be made in the member bank.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator will recall that when this legislation was originally passed there was a good deal of controversy on the subject as to whether a portion of the money should be deposited in State banks. The law, after full discussion, was passed as it now stands on the statute book. My own opinion is, as I stated in the first sentence in my answer to the Senator's inquiry, that the Government should do business with its own agents. Its own agents are members of the Federal Reserve System in the various localities; they are inspected under regulations made by the Government, and in every sense it seems to me that it is good business and good administration that, as far as possible, moneys received on account of these deposits should be deposited in national banks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the postal savings bank bill was first before the Senate the question as to the amount of money that should be allowed to be deposited by any one person was discussed for hours. When it was finally decided that the amount should be $500 some Senators thought that was too much. As the object of the bill was to get into circulation money that we supposed was in hiding in small amounts and, as has well been said, by foreigners or people of foreign birth, I had no objection to the $500 provided for in the bill. I really think that that should be the amount, and it should be the limit.

When this bill was first presented to the Senate there was opposition to the increase of that amount. Under the conditions existing to-day, Mr. President, I shall not now object to increasing the amount to $1,000, although I do believe that it will be an unwise step to take, and certainly if conditions were normal.

I am not one who believes that when a man saves a thousand dollars and desires to invest it he ought to be allowed to deposit it temporarily in a post office in a little town with no provisions to make it secure, and the Government being responsible for the amount if it is lost.

I do not want to delay the passage of the bill. My opposition would not go that far, but I did hope the committee would stop with allowing one person to deposit $1,000, on which he would be paid interest. However, they have gone further than that and have provided that the board of trustees may, in their discretion and under such regulations as such boards may promulgate, accept additional deposits not to exceed, in the aggregate, $1,000 for each depositor, but upon which no interest shall be paid.

Mr. President, there is no doubt in my mind but that the money which will be deposited under that provision will be deposited temporarily and be deposited for safe-keeping by the Government. It will not remain with the Government long, perhaps 10 days or 20 days or 30 days, until the depositor can find some profitable investment to make or until he can make some turn in stocks of some kind in which he may invest it more profitably.

That is not what the Postal Savings System was created for. This policy does not instill in the people a desire to accumulate or save. But this law will not be used for the purpose of allowing an individual to deposit a thousand dollars with the privilege of drawing interest on it and then another thousand dollars with no interest to be paid by the Government. That, Mr. President, I believe is the unfortunate part of the bill.

I am in full accord with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said in regard to it. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee upon what basis and for what reason the last provision was included in the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill, it must be understood, in the original plan and now is mainly for the convenience and accommodation of our foreign-born citizens. Ninety-eight per cent of all the money deposited in the postal savings banks has been deposited by that class. The Post Office Department were of the opinion that if they were permitted to deposit $1,000 and get the interest and allowed to deposit an additional $1,000 on which they get no interest, then it would bring a great deal of money out from hiding that otherwise would not come out. As to how long it is going to stay there no one can tell. It may stay there a long time, but I do not suppose it will stay a very long time when no interest is paid on it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me for a moment, I recall very well that about two months ago the postmaster at Passaic, N. J., a veritable hive of industry, was here in Washington, and the matter of postal savings was discussed between him and myself. He urged that the limit be made not less than $2,000. I said that would be unheard of. Said he, "Senator, I have had two parties in Passaic within a month, one having nineteen hundred dollars and the other a thousand dollars, who wanted me to take it. I told them I had no authority to take such a sum." I said to the postmaster that they could take it to the savings bank. He said, "No; they would not put it in the savings bank; that they are afraid of institutions of that character." He said they told him, "If your Government will take it, I will be perfectly satisfied for safe-keeping, even though I get no interest."

I recall that I asked him if he could not put in writing some of the highest deposits he had. He had many that were $1,100 and $1,200. These were mainly, as the Senator from Alabama states, from foreigners, naturalized or otherwise. They were working in the mills of Passaic and the mills of Paterson. They were great accumulators and great savers, and to increase the limit would be to take it out from the stocking legs and the hidden drawers and bring it to some purpose. They were perfectly satisfied to leave it even without interest in the post office rather than have it in a savings bank. One of them said, "Oh, no, no; no bank. Your Government take it, and I will be satisfied."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think if the case of the man who had the $1,900 had been looked into it would be found that his disinclination to deposit in a bank was not so much because of the fact that he had a fear of the safety of the bank as it was that the bank required certain notifications before he could draw the money out.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I can not answer as to that, but I know the general impression that I gained from him was that it was their distrust—possibly a foolish distrust—of the banks. Another man said that in his country they had Government banks; but there were no such banks here. I can not now recall the name of the gentleman, but it was the postmaster at Passaic who made this statement. He said that some such legislation as this would unquestionably be a great advantage to these savers as well as to the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to add to the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] an instance which I heard the Government director of the postal savings bank relate last summer in speaking of the effect of this small maximum or limitation upon deposits and the manner in which it interfered with the system. He gave a number of instances, one of which was that of a foreigner having $500 in money upon his person, and who applied, I think, to the post office in New York City, if my memory serves me aright, for the making of a deposit. He produced his $500; but upon being told that the deposit was limited to a maximum of $100 he declined to make any deposit whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that such a depositor would now have a right to deposit $500.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But he could only deposit $100 at a time.

Mr. THOMAS. I am giving this instance. As now stated by Senators upon the floor, I am aware that the maximum which may be deposited is $500. This man was then advised to take his money to a bank, and he made practically the same reply as that which was stated by the Senator from New Jersey a moment ago.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, it was stated by the officials of the department who appeared before the Post Office Committee, with reference to this bill, that applications had been made for large deposits, far exceeding even what is allowed here; but the department was satisfied that if we permitted a deposit of $1,000 without paying interest, and arrangements could be made for the money to be promptly paid to the bank where the deposit was made, as a result it would get 2 per cent interest and pay none, it would have a tendency to make the system more profitable, and that a great many people desired to have this privilege. The banks would have the money, and arrangements would be made with that amount of money so that it would promptly be paid without any embarrassment to the banks or the people who made the deposits and with profit to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, there are individuals who may have two or three or four thousand dollars and might not have decided as to what investment they should make; but what I apprehend will be the result of this bill, if enacted into law, an individual of that kind will go to the post office of the town in which he lives, deposit the $1,000, and it will remain with the Government but a very short time. The whole responsibility of keeping it—the safety of the money—will be thrown upon the Government of the United States. For the few days that the Government has the money—perhaps not long enough for the money to be transferred from the post office to the local bank and from the local bank to the United States depositary with which that local bank deals—it would never be of any benefit whatever to the Government, and the Government would have to be responsible for the handling and the keeping of the money.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I wish to say, as to the local bank in the city, that the Government does not have responsibility, except between the time the money is put into the postal savings bank and deposited in the local bank. Arrangements could be made with the local banks, we were assured, by which these payments could be promptly made. The Government would pay no interest, and arrangements would be made with the banks for a certain rate of interest if it were called when needed.

In addition to that, this provision will be beneficial in a time of panic in a city when people lose confidence in the banks. Nearly everybody may know the bank is safe, yet the class of people who would avail themselves of this legislation do not know that. Consequently they could deposit money in the postal savings bank in the morning, the bank could give the security required, the Government would be absolutely safe, and the money could be put in the bank and the situation saved. It is thought that this will be one of the best features in connection with the legislation, especially in mining camps and in communities where there are a great many foreigners, who have not any confidence in banks. It would maintain stability of conditions, and the Government could very frequently save a panic and a run on the banks by having this legislation. As I have said, the Government does not lose anything, because it pays no interest.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. The time the Senator from Virginia suggests would be the very time when the depositor would not draw out his money from the post-office depository; that is when it would add stability to the finances of the community. I believed from the time this principle first began to be agitated that the more we could extend this system the better; that there could be no legislation adopted that would add so much to the stability of finances in a time of panic as would the postal savings bank.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if that were the theory of this legislation——

Mr. CLAPP. No; it is not the theory, but it is an incident that we may well take into account if properly adjusted to the original theory.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if that were the theory, then we ought to increase the amount; but I never understood that that was the object of the original legislation.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, as the Senator from Virginia having the bill in charge wants to secure its passage at once. There were, however, a number of other things which I desired to say in opposition to this last provision; but under the conditions I will conclude.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, are amendments now in order to the pending proposed committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to strike out on page 3, lines 5, 6, and 7, the words:

> But the amount deposited in any one bank shall at no time exceed the amount of the paid-in capital and one-half of the surplus of such bank.

The same section provides on page 2, that the board of trustees shall take security "in public bonds or other securities, supported by the taxing power" for the deposits which are made in the banks. So that really there is no need for the limitation on page 3, of which I speak; and the effect of that limitation will be that the small country banks in the small towns having small capital will very soon reach the limit which they are allowed to take under this clause. Then the postal savings funds which originated there will have to be sent away to some large city, contrary to the general policy and purpose of the act, which was intended to encourage the retention of the funds in the community. I hope that the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, I believe, ought not to be adopted. All of our banking laws, both State and National, have in view the preventing of large loans to any one concern or individual. Under State laws the limit is generally 15 per cent, and under the national laws 10 per cent. It does seem to me that there ought to be a limit as to the amount which the Government may deposit in a bank. If one depositor has on deposit subject to call as much as the capital stock and 50 per cent of the surplus, it seems to me for the safety of the bank that is sufficient.

I know the Senator may say that before the money is deposited the Government will have security which may be sold in case a call is made. That is true; but it may be a great disadvantage to the bank to have a call made and the securities sold as provided for. I think that the provision referred to by the Senator from Washington is a very good provision, although, if the Senator having the bill in charge wants to accept the amendment, I shall offer no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am willing to accept the amendment in order that it may be considered more carefully when the bill gets into conference. It may be a good amendment, and therefore I accept it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not think the objections made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] are at all effective. Before any postal savings funds are deposited in any bank the bank must deposit bonds with the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I said.

Mr. GRONNA. That security must be furnished before the postal savings funds can be deposited in a bank. The capital stock and surplus of a bank are not of themselves any additional security.

Mr. President, I understand the chairman of the committee has accepted this amendment. I think that is all the more reason why there should be no limitation placed upon the amount to be deposited in a bank, because this bill deals with a certain class of banks only. It prohibits the deposit of postal savings funds in State banks if there is a Federal reserve bank in the community. I believe that is an unfair discrimination. I realize, of course, that it is in the interest of the Federal reserve banks, but if the Federal Reserve System is faulty, then, sir, we should repeal the law which created it. I am opposed to the provision of this bill which requires that only Federal reserve banks shall receive postal savings deposits in communities where there is a Federal reserve bank. There ought not to be such a discrimination. If the people of a community want to do business with a State bank, the Congress of the United States should not interfere. We should not prohibit or make it impossible for the postmaster to do business with that bank.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the present law requires all postal savings funds to be deposited in Federal reserve banks.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I am aware of that.

Mr. SWANSON. We passed last year a law which eliminated that provision and allowed such funds to be deposited equally in Federal reserve banks and State banks.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. The President vetoed that bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. And it could not be passed over his veto. This bill endeavors to compromise the situation by giving the first preference to the Federal reserve banks; and if there is no Federal reserve bank in a community, then the postal savings funds may be deposited in a State bank, so that the money will remain in the community where it was originally deposited. That is the main question, it seems to me, and I hope the Senator will not jeopardize this legislation by insisting on reopening a matter which we embodied in a bill 12 months ago and passed, but which was defeated by the presidential veto. This bill gives State banks a better opportunity than they will have if this bill is not enacted into law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The State banks will be able to secure none of these deposits if this bill is defeated.

Mr. SWANSON. That is true; they will secure none if the bill is defeated. I know that in a great many States, including my State, the situation is very much like that in North Dakota; but it seems to me we are getting remedial legislation—not all that some desire, but still we are getting a provision which will allow postal savings funds to remain in the communities where the money is originally deposited.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I admit that if this provision is enacted into law it will be an improvement upon the present law, but we ought not to prohibit anybody from depositing money in State banks as well as in the national banks. The national banks, of course, must necessarily belong to the Federal Reserve System. I think it is unfair to a community where there are a great many State banks but only a limited number of national banks. Of course it is evident that legislation of this kind is passed for the purpose of compelling State banks to enter the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me for a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the law as it now is postal savings funds must all go to the national banks—member banks of the Federal Reserve System. None of it can be deposited in a State bank under any circumstances. The purpose of this amendment to the law is to permit deposits to be made in State banks in communities where there is no Federal reserve bank. That is the whole of this proposition. If we fail to pass this bill the State banks will not get a cent, and can not under any circumstances get a cent, of the postal savings funds which may be deposited in banks. The law now compels all deposits to be made with banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the Federal reserve act that is required.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the Federal reserve act requires that.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I do not want to defeat this legislation. I have before me the Federal reserve act, and I find that on page 16, at the bottom of that page, it provides that all postal savings funds must be deposited in Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is exactly what we are trying to get rid of by this amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I am familiar with that, Mr. President, but I should like to see this bill amended so that postal savings funds may be deposited in any bank, whether a national bank or a State bank or a savings bank.

Mr. GALLINGER. That provision was in the original postal savings act.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I understand such a provision was in the original postal savings act.

Mr. GALLINGER. There was no discrimination; but that provision, of course, was practically repealed by the Federal reserve act, which provided differently.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Alabama should permit us to amend this important bill by making it possible for State banks and trust companies to receive postal savings deposits, as well as national banks. That is my only objection to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, to do that would simply mean no bill at all at this session of Congress.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the amendment which I submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not necessary. The chairman of the committee has accepted the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have accepted the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington is through—and, as his amendment has been accepted by the Senator from Alabama, that makes it law, I presume, so far as the Senate is concerned—I desire to offer an amendment. I move to amend the committee amendment, on page 3, by striking out, beginning with line 8, down to and including the word "same," in line 16 of that page. The language I move to strike out is as follows:

Provided, however, If one or more member banks of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, exists in the city, town, village, or locality where the postal deposits are made, such deposits shall be placed in such member banks substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of each such bank, but if such member banks fail to qualify to receive such deposits, then any other bank located therein may, as hereinbefore provided, qualify and receive the same.

Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to take out of the bill the discrimination between National and State banks with regard to deposits. If this language is stricken out, under the bill as it will then stand the postal savings bank funds will be deposited in State and National banks, without any discrimination between the two systems.

It is provided in the law that security must be given, and the kind of security is stipulated. The same security must be given by one bank as by another. I can see no reason why we should say that postal savings funds should be deposited in national banks. It is true that if there are no national banks, then the bill would permit the deposit of such funds in State banks. That of itself shows that there is no legitimate reason against depositing money in State banks. The only reason that I can conceive of—and I presume it is the only reason that exists—for providing that postal savings funds must be deposited in national banks or member banks of the reserve system is to help build up that system. It is a discrimination against State banks.

Mr. President, if the States resorted to that method of discrimination against national banks, we would see the rule work the other way. In every State there are State funds, county funds, municipal funds, and various other kinds of funds, belonging to the States and municipalities; and I do not know of a single instance where a State, by law, has undertaken to discriminate against national banks in favor of banks organized under its own laws. If we start the discrimination, they are liable to follow it up, and with good reason, too. If they did, they would seriously interfere in a great many cases with the prosperity of national banks. We are establishing, by this method of procedure, a precedent which, if the States should follow it, would take away from deposits in all national banks all State money, county money, and municipal and city money—in fact, all money that is under the control of the laws of a State.

In the first place, it is not fair that we should do this. As the Senator from North Dakota has well said, if the Federal Reserve System can not stand up without discriminating against some other legitimate business, it ought to go out of business. We have passed at this session a bill which is now pending before the House of Representatives, and which provides that in States having laws providing for the security of deposits, national banks shall have the right, if the State laws permit them to do so, to take advantage of those laws, and secure their deposits under State laws. As far as I know there is not a State that has passed that kind of a law but that has extended that provision to national banks, and has said: "Come under our system if you want to."

We have passed, as far as the Senate is concerned, a bill that will extend that permission, which, under the ruling of the comptroller, did not exist before, and permit the national banks to take advantage of State laws in that kind of a case. It is only a fair step to put all the banks on the same basis and to permit them to follow their legitimate course of procedure, and not provide, by law, that these savings, deposited by the people of the community in the post office of a town where there is a State bank and a national bank, shall then all be deposited in the national bank and none of them in the State bank.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a minute?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am somewhat in sympathy with what the Senator is saying; but this legislation goes just about as far along that line as we can hope to get through. If the Senator insists upon the extreme, he will probably defeat any progress in that direction.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it is extreme. I am in favor of doing what I believe to be the proper thing to do. If the President wants to veto the bill, that is his privilege. I do not see any reason why Senators should say that the President is going to veto this bill if we put in this provision. There are a good many other things in the bill, and if he does veto it, it will come back to us again. If it is fair, if Senators believe in it, if all those who are supporting it are in favor of it, we will have enough votes to pass it over the President's veto, even if he does veto it.

I do not desire to delay this legislation. I am perfectly willing to have a vote taken on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Nebraska how much of the text he moves to strike out?

Mr. NORRIS. I move to strike out the words commencing with line 8 on page 3 and going down to the word "same," in line 16. If that amendment prevails, it will be necessary to make a formal amendment farther down to make the text read right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Evidently so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], who is necessarily absent, and my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] has a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. The junior Senator from Missouri is here. By arrangement with him we have transferred our pairs, so that my colleague will stand paired with the Senator from Florida. Therefore the Senator from Missouri and myself are at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and will vote. I vote "nay."

I desire also to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CLAPP. I inquire if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLAPP. I feel constrained, then, to withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WEEKS. My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent; but, as I announced before, he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I am confident that if my colleague were present he would vote in the negative on this proposition. I understand the Senator from Georgia has already voted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. While I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I only vote without a transfer in cases where the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] advises me that his colleague would vote as I would. I voted on this question because I had been advised that the senior Senator from Massachusetts would vote as I intended to vote; and I am glad to make that statement as to other votes in the future, without detaining the Senate to repeat it.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] on official business, and his pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. REED. An arrangement having been made with the Senator from Michigan for a transfer of pairs, I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Borah	Hitchcock	Lane	Smoot
Cummins	Jones	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter
Gronna	La Follette	Sherman

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further amendment to be proposed as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think the committee agreed that, on page 2, at the end of line 21, the words "or authorized by act of Congress" might be inserted.

Mr. SWANSON. That has been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, then, on agreeing to the amendment as amended and modified.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing the Postal Savings System, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by E. T. Taylor, jr., one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916, and prior fiscal years, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10037) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. ASHBROOK, and Mr. LANGLEY, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11078) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. ASHBROOK, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13043. An act making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not purpose speaking upon the unfinished business, but in accordance with a notice which I gave yesterday I shall speak briefly upon the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, South Carolina has furnished to the Union many illustrious men and may well feel proud of her son, Senator BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN. More than 20 years ago he was urging the passage of a bill providing for the erection of a Government factory for the manufacture of armor plate, and the success which, in my judgment, will attend his efforts, is an illustration of the fact that an idea which is founded in truth may be crushed for a time, but it will ultimately triumph. It is given to but few men to realize results from their efforts in such great movements as this, and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. TILLMAN] may well congratulate himself upon the fact that the sentiment of the country is now well-nigh unanimous in favor of Government ownership of factories for the manufacture not only of armor plate, but powder and arms as well.

The hearings had before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs 20 years ago demonstrated that the Government could manufacture armor for its naval vessels at about two-thirds the price such armor could be obtained if it were manufactured in private plants and sold to the Government. I have no doubt that the United States Government will save at least $1,000,000 on each superdreadnaught it constructs, if the armor for the ship is manufactured in a Government-owned plant instead of in a privately owned plant.

In my opinion there are many reasons why the Government should manufacture its own arms, guns, powder, warcraft, and armor plate.

Firstly, when such arms and ammunition, and so forth, are constructed by the Government there is no profit to be paid to anyone, hence there is a large retrenchment; in other words, a substantial saving to the Treasury.

Secondly, from the very nature of the armor business a monopoly is inevitable, as there is generally but one customer, and that is the United States. Large capital is required to finance an armor plant, and this excludes all but the very largest concerns from engaging in such business. There are but three manufacturers of armor in the United States, and the result has been that an odious monopoly has grown up. This monopoly has no competition. It can and does charge what it pleases and, as has been well said in the report of the committee on this bill:

> The committee has no desire to criticize unjustly the manufacturers of armor plate. They have done no more than most other men would have done under similar circumstances and temptations. Men in the pursuit of wealth are essentially greedy and hoggish, and the protective principle seems to have been prolific in producing some magnificent specimens. The main fact to be borne in mind is that they have more power than is compatible with the public interest. Give power to any set of men, however excellent and honorable, and sooner or later they will abuse it. Men have been built that way since the beginning of time.

It seems to me that all men, whether they be those who "favor peace at any price," those who favor "peace with honor," those who "love peace so well they are willing to fight for it," or those who wish "war at any price," ought to be in favor of Government manufacture and construction of arms and ammunition and armament for naval ships, so that in time of great distress or national emergency the Government would not be obliged to depend upon private persons for its armor plate and guns, but could have resort to its own factories and manufacture much or little, as the emergencies might require.

I am not opposed to appropriations out of the Treasury simply because they are large. If an appropriation is large but just, I am willing to vote for it; if it be unjust, the fact that it is a very small appropriation does not incline me at all to vote for it. The nature of the appropriation and the purposes for which it is to be used, not the amount, is what concerns me. I think, nevertheless, that every reasonable and practicable effort should be made to retrench, and we should save every dollar of the public funds that we may as practical persons.

There is, however, a deeper reason why I am in favor of the manufacture by the Government of its arms and ammunition, powder, and armor plate for its vessels. There are in our Nation men who are for "peace at any price," and there are men who are for "war at any price." These "war-at-any-price" men are moved by different motives. Some of them love to hear the heroic call of the silver bugles; some love the excitement incident to a war—they love the pomp and circumstance that attend military and naval operations; others, desirous of selling armor plate, guns, powder, and other munitions to the Government, promote the war spirit by violent criticism of an administration; by subtle, ingenious, and specious appeals to national honor, when in truth and in fact national honor may not be endangered; sometimes sweep Members of Congress off their feet and thus precipitate a conflict where by patience it might have been avoided. Therefore, if the manufacture of armor plate, guns, powder, naval vessels, and other like munitions were left largely to the United States, our Government would be free to act upon any certain state of facts uninfluenced, unprejudiced, and unbiased, and the powerful influence of the makers of armor and ammunition, anxious to make sales to the Government, would not in any way be thrown into the trembling scales in which the truth is to be weighed.

If it should ever become the solemn duty of Congress to declare war in the future, we should do it manfully, bravely, and, above all things, uninfluenced in any way or in any manner whatsoever by those powerful interests which seek to promote war in order that they may furnish multiplied quantities of arms, ammunition, powder, guns, and armor plate to the Government.

Mr. President, even were I convinced, which I am not, that a plant for the manufacture of armor plate and powder for the use of the guns of the Army and Navy would cost this Government more than it would to purchase the same from the owners of private plants, I would nevertheless be in favor of Government manufacture of such articles.

I read from the hearings before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, Tuesday, February 1, 1916, as follows:

[Extracts from the statement of Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy.]

Senator PENROSE. Mr. Secretary, have you read these hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs, in connection with Senate bill 1417, to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor?

Secretary DANIELS. I have read a part of them.

Senator PENROSE. You are familiar, of course, with the subject?

Secretary DANIELS. With the subject matter; yes.

Senator PENROSE. You are familiar with the subject matter; but as these hearings are down to date I think they are, perhaps, more valuable.

Secretary DANIELS. I did not get the hearings until yesterday afternoon. I have not read them all.

Senator PENROSE. When the committee adjourned last week, Mr. Secretary, it adjourned with the understanding that the armor-plate manufacturers could, if they chose or would, call to see you to pursue the discussion of this matter further with you as the executive head of the Navy Department, and the person who in the final analysis would have to advertise and perhaps frame specifications and come to an adjustment of the matter of price. And I am informed that these gentlemen have called on you, although I am not advised as to the details of the visit.

Will you inform the committee as to the character of the interview and your views on the matter or would you rather have Mr. Grace put on the stand?

Secretary DANIELS. I will make a statement and then Mr. Grace may make a statement, if it is desired.

Representatives of two of these companies, the Bethlehem and Midvale companies, came to see me after you adjourned last week and said it had been suggested by the committee, or some member of the committee——

Senator PENROSE. I suggested it.

Secretary DANIELS (continuing). That they confer with me; and their proposition was that I should appoint an expert accountant or accountants who would go through their books to determine what it costs to produce a ton of armor plate and get all the information in detail; and after doing so I would report to the committee whether, in my judgment, with all this confidential information in my possession, the price they proposed was a reasonable one with a fair profit.

We discussed the matter at some length, and I told them that a year ago or more the Carnegie Co. had sent me a very long and elaborate statement purporting to be the cost of manufacturing armor plate, the investment, the overhead charges, etc., and asked me to look into it to inform myself as to whether it was a proper price to charge in view of their investments and costs. I sent it back to that company without examining it carefully and told them that I could not accept any information confidentially; that any information they gave me about their plant as to its costs, operations, pay of labor, etc., must be a statement which I could lay before the Senate committee or the House committee, as the case might be; that as Secretary of the Navy I could not accept any confidential information; that I would not ask the Senate committee to act upon my statement that I had examined into their affairs and approved or disapproved them; that if they wished to state all these facts before the committee or to me to be transmitted to Congress I would accept them, otherwise I would not. I returned their long statement with that reply.

So I told these gentlemen the other day that I could not under any circumstances agree to enter into any investigation of their plants or accept any confidential statements that they made or that any experts I appointed might make that could not appear in the hearings or go before Congress. It seemed to me that that was the only possible position an executive officer could take.

Senator PENROSE. Of course, they had their explanation about why they did not want to give the details of their business?

Secretary DANIELS. They said they did not wish to give to the public the details of their business, that it would be giving it to their competitors and to the world; but they were willing to give it in confidence to the Secretary of the Navy.

Senator PENROSE. The business, as I understand it, being of an international character, and frequently in the past there has been the most serious competition to acquire methods, patents, and processes——

Secretary DANIELS. Why, as to the international nature of the business——

Senator PENROSE. The possibly international character of the business.

Secretary DANIELS (continuing). The only international business these companies have had that I know of you will find on page 9 of my report of 1913.

Senator PENROSE. Well, we concede, Mr. Secretary, it has not been very large in the past. It is something, however, that might occur.

Secretary DANIELS. Well, in 1894 there was some international business. The Bethlehem Co. sold armor plate to Russia in 1894 at $249 a ton; at the same time, under the contract of March, 1893, they sold armor plate to the American Government for $616.14 per ton. In 1911 they sold to Italy at $395 a ton, while they were charging this Government $420 a ton. Later they sold it to Japan for $406.35 a ton, as against prices ranging from $504 to $440 a ton to this country.

Since then I understand there have been no international sales; neither has any foreign Government sought to sell in this country, and none of our companies have sought to sell abroad. That being true, they did not raise any objection to making the information public on international grounds.

Senator PENROSE. They did not?

Secretary DANIELS. No. They said their objection to giving the details to the public was that it would disclose their private business to their competitors in America. My reply to that was that they had no competitors in America, for all the manufacturers of armor charged identically the same price.

Senator PENROSE. And they will have fewer competitors, I presume, if the Government keeps on. Was there any further suggestions made, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes. Then we discussed the matter as to price. I told them if they had any statement to make as to the price they would charge in the future I would be glad to have it for consideration. Two of those companies, the Midvale Steel Co. and the Bethlehem Steel Co., submitted letters. The letter from the Midvale Steel Co. is as follows:

"Based upon our conversation in your office on Wednesday, January 26, 1916, if a construction program is arranged which will permit the Navy Department to purchase 125,000 tons of armor for delivery during the next five years we will be willing to contract for 40,000 tons, our capacity for five years, the same to be specified at the uniform rate of 8,000 tons per year, at $402.50, base, per ton, all conditions as to terms, specifications, and manufacturing details to remain the same as provided under the present contract.

"Very truly, yours,

"A. C. DINKEY, President."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a recent communication?

Secretary DANIELS. January 27, 1916.

Senator PENROSE. That is an offer to supply the armor on this schedule at $402?

Secretary DANIELS. Four hundred and two dollars and fifty cents a ton if we make a contract for five years on the program that the President has recommended.

Senator PENROSE. What is the price the Government is paying now, do you remember?

Secretary DANIELS. Four hundred and twenty-five dollars. That is a reduction by the Midvale Steel Co. from $425 to $402.50.

Senator SWANSON. That covers 40,000 tons?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; that is their capacity. I also received a letter from the Bethlehem Steel Co. It is as follows:

"With a view to conforming to the conversation we had with you yesterday, prompted by the suggestion to us of the Senate Naval Committee that the private armor-plate manufacturers endeavor to reach an agreement with the Secretary of the Navy on a price for armor sufficiently attractive to him to make unnecessary the proposed legislation before the committee for the construction of a Government armor-plate plant, we respectfully submit the following proposal:

"We will undertake to manufacture one-third or such additional quantity as may be awarded to us, of the armor plate required for the contemplated five-year naval program (estimated at approximately 120,000 tons), for a price of $395 per ton for side armor, as compared with the price of $425 per ton now obtaining; similar reductions to be made in other classes.

"In quoting this low price we have been prompted by the desire to meet your views as to a satisfactory price for armor and to the end of making it unnecessary, in your judgment, to create Government facilities for this work, and thus, in a measure, save to our interests the large investment we have in this industry.

"Very respectfully,

"E. G. GRACE, President."

Now, these two concerns, as I understand it, proposed to manufacture each one-third at those prices.

Mr. GRACE. One-third or more. My letter says, "a third or any additional amount."

Mr. BARBA. I might say that our capacity is 8,000 a year.

Mr. GRACE. Our capacity is 12,000 a year, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary DANIELS. I received no communication from the Carnegie Co., which has been making one-third of it in the past. The plan heretofore pursued has been—the Midvale company was organized when?

Mr. BARBA. As a company?
Secretary DANIELS. I mean to make armor plate.
Mr. BARBA. In 1903.
Secretary DANIELS. Up to 1903 there were only two companies, the Bethlehem and the Carnegie, and then the Midvale company came into the business in 1903. They made a bid for making armor plate which was considerably lower than the price that the Bethlehem and Carnegie companies had been charging. But I am informed that when they made this lower bid the award was not made to them.
Senator PENROSE. They did not have a plant at that time, Mr. Secretary, in the opinion of the Government, to make it certain that they could discharge such a contract.
Secretary DANIELS (speaking to Mr. Barba of the Midvale Co.). Did they not make a lower bid after they had a plant?
Mr. BARBA. We made this bid in 1903, after the plant was practically erected. We had prior to 1903 made five separate bids which were the lowest prices quoted, and for the reason noted by Senator PENROSE—ostensibly at least—they failed of receiving the award under their earlier bids, but on the bid of 1903 an award was made.
Secretary DANIELS. As I understand it, in 1903 they were the lowest bidder, after the plant was erected, but the Navy Department instead of giving it to the lowest bidder divided it among the three companies at the bid of the lowest bidder. That is right, is it not?
Mr. BARBA. No. I think that year the other two companies got two-thirds of the armor at their quoted prices.
Secretary DANIELS. The Navy Department gave this company that made the lowest bid a third, and then gave the other two-thirds to those other companies at their high prices.
Senator SMITH of Maryland. Did your company offer to furnish all of it at that price?
Mr. BARBA. They did, sir.
Secretary DANIELS. They offered to furnish it all.
The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you, Mr. Barba, were they in condition then to manufacture it all, or would they have put themselves in condition to manufacture it all?
Mr. BARBA. As was testified a week ago, the Midvale Co. believed itself in a position to manufacture the whole of the armor that would be required for installation on the ships.
Secretary DANIELS. Of course, that all happened before I had any connection with the Navy Department.
Senator POINDEXTER. I wish you would explain, Mr. Secretary, why you did not give them the contract for it all instead of giving a contract for two-thirds at the higher price.
Secretary DANIELS. If I had been Secretary of the Navy I would have done so.
Senator PENROSE. If I may be permitted to interject—as I understand it, it was on a theory which now seems to be obsolete except in connection with shipbuilding. We frequently put in the naval bill the proviso that one battleship shall be built on the Atlantic seaboard and one on the Pacific, to keep the shipyards going. Mr. Grace knows. Am I correct in stating that sometimes in carrying out that policy a higher price is paid for a ship built in one place than for a ship built elsewhere?
Mr. GRACE. You are entirely correct.
Senator PENROSE. Both ships are not given to the lowest bidder. It has been the policy of the Government for 50 years to encourage the manufacturers and individuals in their ability to serve the Government in this connection. These people have all been invited by the Government to go into the armor-plate business. It is not a competitive proposition, strictly speaking, and under the Republican régime and Republican Secretaries of the Navy they have thought it their duty to keep all of them going and not to have what is threatened now, the third company going out of business because the manufacture of armor is too small a part of their enormous business for them to be spending every winter down here in Washington. So it is not unlikely that the third armor plant—I have no authority to speak for them, but they are not represented here. It would seem to me that it is such a small part of their enormous business that they would just as soon get out of it as not.
Senator CHILTON. You refer to the Carnegie Co.?
Senator PENROSE. The United States Steel Corporation.
Senator CHILTON. That is part of it; they own the stock.
Senator PENROSE. When the Midvale Co. came in they were welcomed by the Government, and it was never the theory until within the last few years other than that the Government should encourage them and keep them going.
Secretary DANIELS. They may have been welcomed by the Government, Senator, but when they made the lowest bid and agreed to make armor plate cheaper and agreed to make it all, the Government declined to give them the contract and gave most of it at higher prices to other companies and only gave them a portion.
Senator PENROSE. I do not wish to argue that, Mr. Secretary, but the same policy is adopted regarding the building of battleships?
Secretary DANIELS. No——
Senator PENROSE. If that is to be the policy of the Government, I would like to see all the battleships built on the Delaware, because we can build them cheaper there than anywhere else.
Secretary DANIELS. Our former experience was that what was built on the Pacific coast cost more, and in the bills there has always been the provision for a higher price for ships built on the Pacific coast——
The CHAIRMAN. The percentage was fixed in the bills.
Senator PENROSE. Well, let us follow the rule.
Secretary DANIELS. My experience has been that, though we have built no dreadnaughts on the Pacific coast, the work we have done on the Pacific has been done as cheaply as on the Atlantic. In fact, we have built two or three small ships at Mare Island under the bids made by New York and other eastern yards.
Senator PHELAN. The estimates of the Mare Island yard have been always lower, as I understand it, than the estimates of private yards. And then those vessels are intended, Mr. Secretary, for those waters, and there is the cost of bringing them over from the eastern yards, and the differential has been added. There is also the added cost of bringing the raw material from Pennsylvania.
Secretary DANIELS. That is largely true, and the wages are, I believe, somewhat larger in the West.
Senator PENROSE. The ultimate cost to the Government is higher, and if we are to abandon our old policy let us award our battleships to the lowest bidder, whether it is Norfolk or Philadelphia.
But that is neither here nor there. I merely wanted to explain that the policy with reference to armor plate has only been the same as that with reference to the shipyards.
Secretary DANIELS. I would like to proceed with my statement about our experience in buying armor.
The CHAIRMAN. Very well, Mr. Secretary.
Secretary DANIELS. The first contract we offered, in 1913, was the armor plate for the Arizona, I think.
Mr. BARBA. Yes; No. 39.
Secretary DANIELS. When the bids came in from Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale they were identically the same figure, $454 per ton.
The CHAIRMAN. You mean to say that these three competitors all happened to hit on the same price?
Secretary DANIELS. To a cent.
Senator POINDEXTER. What year was that?
Secretary DANIELS. 1913. I rejected all these bids on the ground that there had been no competition. Later I had a talk with the gentlemen representing these three companies and told them that we wished competition and that I could not understand how they could hit upon identically the same figure to a cent. Their answer was this: The Midvale people said that some years before that, when bids were offered, they had made the lowest bid but were not awarded the contract and that the department adopted the policy of dividing the contract between the three concerns; and they said, of course, "Why should we bid a lower figure if it is going to be awarded one-third to each of us at the same price?" But I advertised again, and they came down to $440 per ton, enabling the department to effect a saving of $111,000 on that contract.
Since then we have had bidding which has varied very little and we have had, of course, practically no competition.
On June 7, 1900, the naval act contained a provision authorizing the building of an armor plant:
"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to procure by contract armor of the best quality for any or all vessels above referred to, provided such contracts can be made at a price which in his judgment is reasonable and equitable; but in case he is unable to make contracts for armor under the above conditions he is hereby authorized and directed to procure a site for and to erect thereon a factory for the manufacture of armor, and the sum of $4,000,000 is hereby appropriated toward the erection of said factory."
He was "satisfied" that the price was "reasonable" and did not build the plant.
In 1895 Secretary Herbert visited Europe and made a thorough investigation into the armor-plate situation. He became satisfied that there was a world-wide agreement by which the manufacturers of one country would not sell in any other country, and he recommended the building of an armor-plate factory as the result of that investigation.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, you evidently believe there is a combination among these manufacturers of armor?
Secretary DANIELS. Well, I evidently believe there is no competition.
The CHAIRMAN. That is a negative way of saying the same thing?
Secretary DANIELS. Not necessarily, because they say to me, very frankly, "We had no inducement to bid; if we bid lower, we do not get any more of the contract than if we bid higher."
The CHAIRMAN. But only the lowest man says that?
Secretary DANIELS. The lowest man; yes.
The CHAIRMAN. The fellow that could not get in explained the reason why?
Secretary DANIELS. And therefore he said, "Why should we bid lower?"
The CHAIRMAN. He would not play in a game where the cards were all stacked before he entered it.
Senator PENROSE. I think it is admitted it is not a strictly competitive proposition. The point of view of the Government has been: Is the Government getting armor plate at a reasonable price and one that can be compared with that which it costs other nations?
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, from your experience with the manufacture of smokeless powder by the Government, you are satisfied that the Government can manufacture armor more cheaply in its own factory than it can buy it?
Secretary DANIELS. There is no doubt of that.
The CHAIRMAN. And the ownership of an armor factory would relieve us of future combinations, or perpetual competitions?
Secretary DANIELS. I think this: If we owned it, we would secure competition from outside plants as well as our own. And I believe, in view of the many changes and new construction, the Government ought to have a factory where its own experts would be studying the best methods of making armor plate.
Of course, the private manufacturers and the Government have worked harmoniously trying to perfect the best armor, but I think the Government ought to be doing it itself. At present the armor-plate factories do not sell abroad, but they have a right to do so, and the armor they are making is the joint product of the brains of the Navy and the armor-plate experts. They have made the armor plate upon our specifications. If our experts should obtain armor plate in this country that was better than could be obtained in any other country in the world and we wished no other country to have it, we have no guaranty now that it would not be sold abroad.
Take the matter of torpedoes. We have gone into the manufacture of torpedoes pretty largely, and we have had a good many manufactured by private concerns. Two years ago the manufacturers of the torpedo which really was the product of the Navy's inventors working with the private concerns were about to sell those torpedoes to foreign countries, and we had to enjoin them in the courts on the ground that that torpedo was a product of the Navy's brains as well as theirs and it should not go abroad. After litigation it was decided in the courts of New York that the private company could not sell them abroad.
In the course of his opinion Judge Cox said:
"This case illustrates the importance of the United States having a manufactory of its own for the manufacture of torpedoes and other implements of war, which are improved and changed from time to time by the addition of ingenious mechanism, which should clearly be kept secret unless our enemies are to profit equally with ourselves in every improvement which the ingenuity of our Army and Navy officers may suggest."
Now, I think the Government ought to make as much as practicable of everything like armor plate, torpedoes, projectiles, and powder—particularly the things that are improving all the time—so as to be able to control them.
Senator SMITH of Maryland. Mr. Secretary, it is not your judgment that the Government should put itself in a position to manufacture them all?
Secretary DANIELS. No; I do not think that is necessary.
Senator SMITH of Maryland. As I understand it, it is your idea that we should have an armor-plate factory for the purpose of knowing what it costs and preventing a monopoly of it?
Secretary DANIELS. In fact, we do not get competitive prices.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. You think it is unwise for us to undertake to manufacture it all, because it would put these other people out of business and destroy the present factories which might be very useful to the Government?

Secretary DANIELS. I have this idea: If you have competition between your own factory and a private factory, you get some advantage. If the Government should make all its own ships, for instance, it would not have quite as much competition in the building of ships as if outside people were bidding.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. What is your idea, Mr. Secretary, of the amount of armor plate that would be required per year for the next five years? It is 25,000 tons a year, as I understand it?

Secretary DANIELS. If this program goes through, we would need 120,000 tons.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. About 25,000 tons a year for the next five years.

Senator CHILTON. That is 113,000 for our actual needs, and then 7,000 tons for testing purposes.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. Is it your idea the Government should make about 20,000 tons of that per year?

Secretary DANIELS. That is a matter, Senator, for the Congress. My estimates, made in November, allowed for a factory that would make 10,000 tons a year. In the report of the committee they pointed out that you could make it much cheaper if you made 20,000 tons, which, of course, is true.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. That may be true. If you will allow me to express myself, I think it wise for this Government to be in a position to know what is being done in armor plate, and it is wise to know what it costs, but I do not think it is wise that this Government should go in and monopolize the business. I think it is well to keep these factories. Now, the proposition is, if 20,000 tons is to be manufactured, that would put the other people out of business entirely, would it not?

Secretary DANIELS. If we were prepared to make 20,000 tons we would be able to make most of the armor required under this program.

Senator PENROSE. It has been strongly intimated that every one of the private concerns would abandon the business and throw their plants into the junk pile and go into other lines of endeavor.

Senator SWANSON. Mr. Secretary, from your investigation of this subject, what suggestions have you to make to the committee as to Senate bill 1417, as to the amount to be appropriated and the amount of armor contemplated to be manufactured by the Government? Will you read that bill and suggest to the committee what you think would be the most advantageous position for the Government to take in reference to it?

Secretary DANIELS. The most advantageous position for the Government to take, looking at it as a matter of economy, would be to pass this bill.

Senator SWANSON. That is, in a broad way; but do you think it would be better to go into the manufacture of armor plate to the exclusion of private concerns or leave a portion of it for private competition?

Secretary DANIELS. In my recommendation and in my estimates, as you will see, I recommended a capacity of 10,000 tons.

Senator PHELAN. I do not know that it has appeared in the testimony here, but I have learned in private conversation that the Krupp concern provided certain munitions, or possibly arms, for the French Government in competition with French private plants, and the deduction was drawn that the French private plants, having been crippled by reason of the competition of the Krupps, were unable to supply the French Government during this war with munitions, certainly not to the extent which otherwise they would have been able to provide them. Is there any truth in that statement?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know, sir. You startle me by any such statement as that.

Senator LODGE. It took them some time to get into a condition to supply their own munitions.

Senator PHELAN. I think the fact bears on this discussion—if it is true. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. That is hearsay, so far as I know. If you and Senator LODGE have any evidence as to the accuracy of that statement I would like to have it.

Senator PHELAN. My informant is present in the room. I think it was Mr. Grace who told me that.

Mr. GRACE. I do not think so, Senator Phelan. I have not talked to you on this subject at all, as a matter of fact. If I had any evidence, I should be very glad to offer it.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. I think that statement is perfectly reasonable.

Senator PHELAN. Who was it called on me in reference to this hearing? It was not Mr. Snyder; he is not present?

Mr. GRACE. Mr. Snyder is not here.

Senator PHELAN. I know it was one of the gentlemen from the Bethlehem plant It ought to be a matter of general information.

Secretary DANIELS. You will remember that a few years ago the papers were full of reports that the Krupp concern had bribed or induced certain newspapers in France to advocate a very large armament. There was a sensational investigation and some of the newspapers appeared in a bad light.

Senator PHELAN. Is it not a fact that the Krupps did supply the French Government within the last 10 years?

Secretary DANIELS. I do not know; it could be ascertained.

Senator LODGE. I did not speak in reference to Krupps. The information I have comes from French sources, and it was simply to this effect, that it took them a year after the war began to get their munition plants into such condition as to supply their needs. They were behind, and they had to put in a great deal of extra machinery and extra men in order to meet the demands for munitions.

The CHAIRMAN. That is notoriously so, because England and all of the rest of the European countries that are in this war were not expecting such a gigantic struggle.

Senator LODGE. The situation in England is very different. I am speaking simply of the French. The munition plants there, for whatever reason, had got so far down that they could not possible meet the demands of the war. They are now meeting them fully.

Senator PHELAN. Having made the statement with the premise that I learned it in private conversation, if it is a fact that the Krupps have supplied the French Government with munitions, is there anybody in this room that can supply that information?

Senator PENROSE. Mr. Grace might be able to answer.

Mr. KING. They did prior to the Franco-Prussian War, sir, but after that it is rather uncertain.

Senator POINDEXTER. I do not think this sort of fishing around for hearsay testimony and rumors amounts to anything, Mr. Chairman.

Senator PHELAN. In making that statement I desired to lay the foundation for this question. Outside of this bill—because I see it does not provide for the acquisition of private plants—has the Secretary of the Navy entertained a proposition to purchase one of the existing plants instead of constructing de novo an armor-plate factory?

The CHAIRMAN. I have never heard of any existing plants being entirely willing to sell. I asked them last year when the committee was up at their different establishments whether they had any idea of selling, and every one of them pooh-poohed it.

Senator PHELAN. Would it not be a wiser policy, instead of by competition destroying an existing plant, to acquire one by purchase or condemnation?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, condemnation would involve such an immense amount of litigation and be so costly that I do not think the Government would enter upon any such speculation.

Senator PHELAN. Assuming these gentlemen representing these various plants would agree to sell at a reasonable price, is there any objection on the part of the committee or in your mind to acquiring an existing plant?

Senator SMITH of Maryland. Is it likely they would sell at a reasonable price now, when there is such a demand for their products? If there ever was an opportunity for them to make money, it is now.

Senator POINDEXTER. Has the Secretary completed his statement, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I notice in your report that you ask for an appropriation for an ammunition plant?

Secretary DANIELS. A projectile plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any reason why this armor plant that we are going to build—I hope—can not also produce the ammunition necessary for the Navy?

Secretary DANIELS. You would have to have different equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course you would have to have additional equipment.

Secretary DANIELS. If you will notice in my report, I recommended "for armor plate and other munitions." You can make forgings and you can make some other things, but there is no reason why you should not add to that plant other equipment to make certain munitions. But the armor-plate machinery itself makes only armor plate.

The CHAIRMAN. We all know that; at least I do, because I am an old hand at this investigation of armor. This was my first work in the Senate when I came here 20 years ago, and I perhaps know more about armor factories than any man on the committee.

Senator LODGE. Mr. Secretary, may I ask you on what are based the figures for the cost of the armor made by the Government plant?

Secretary DANIELS. A special committee, composed of Senator TILLMAN, Chairman PADGETT, and Admiral Strauss, made an investigation. The figures given are from that report. Your committee last year authorized that to be done.

Senator LODGE. Yes; I know.

Secretary DANIELS. And they went into the investigation very carefully. They visited Bethlehem, Midvale, and Carnegie. At the time the appointment of the committee was proposed I hoped the members would be able also to visit European countries, and I think that was part of the idea, to try to ascertain the cost abroad as well as at home.

Senator LODGE. Then the figures you give for the cost of armor plate manufactured by a Government plant are based on that report?

Secretary DANIELS. They are based on that report.

The CHAIRMAN. These manufacturers of armor have agreed that it is only 10 per cent wrong. I believe that was the testimony last week.

Senator LODGE. In those figures of the cost of Government manufacture do you include interest, overhead charges, insurance, and everything of that sort?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Senator SWANSON. I think they include everything except interest.

Secretary DANIELS. Do they not include interest?

Senator PENROSE. It is only fair to say on that point that this matter was thoroughly discussed the other afternoon, and there was a difference of opinion between this Tillman report and the statement of Mr. Grace and his associates.

Senator SWANSON. I think they stated, Senator Penrose, there would be only 10 per cent difference between what it has cost them, as shown by their books, and the estimate contained in this report.

Senator PENROSE. Down to the period where you get that figure, but there are other deductions that should be made.

Senator SWANSON. Mr. Secretary, do you think it would be advantageous to the Government, as suggested by the Senator from California, to make the erection or purchase of an armor-plate factory optional with the department; to give you the power to purchase an existing plant if you saw proper, or to erect one if you saw proper? What do you think would be the advisability of leaving that optional with the department?

Secretary DANIELS. I think if we could purchase one at a reasonable price it would be better than to build, because we would get it cheaper.

Senator SWANSON. It would be available at once; otherwise there would be a delay of three years?

Secretary DANIELS. Two or possibly three years. We might complete it in 18 months.

Senator LODGE. This plant you propose is a 10,000-ton plant?

Secretary DANIELS. That is my estimate.

Senator CHILTON. The bill provides for 20,000 tons.

Senator LODGE. Will you kindly tell me again what will probably be the annual consumption?

Secretary DANIELS. It all depends, of course——

Senator LODGE. I understand—on what we authorize.

Secretary DANIELS. On the proposed building program it will be 120,000 tons for the five years.

Senator LODGE. One battleship requires about 8,000 tons?

Secretary DANIELS. About that.

Senator LODGE. And we have been authorizing at the rate of two ships—16,000 tons?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; generally.

Senator LODGE. And the 20,000-ton plant would make all the armor necessary for the battleships unless you added a battle cruiser or a third ship?

Secretary DANIELS. Not all of that, but nearly.

Senator LODGE. I understood the estimate of $10,000,000 was for a 10,000-ton plant.

Senator PENROSE. Mr. Grace says that is all such a plant would produce. Admiral Strauss differs with him by 100 per cent. He says it would produce 20,000 tons

Secretary DANIELS. Of course, we estimated on what Admiral Strauss stated in his testimony.

Senator LODGE. And the time he figures is 18 months?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the time necessary, in the opinion of the present Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Mr. Harris, is that if you will cut the red tape in the Navy Department—you know what red tape is; I don't—he can build it in 18 months.

Senator LODGE. And these estimates all rest on the opinions of bureau chiefs?

Senator PENROSE. Who are not experts on armor plate.

Secretary DANIELS. You could build it in 18 months or 2 years if there was no delay.

Senator LODGE. I mean, the estimates and everything else rest on the estimates of the bureau chiefs?

Secretary DANIELS. Why, of course.

Senator PAGE. Mr. Secretary, if the exigencies which the President tells us may appear immediately should come to pass, are we not liable to want, perhaps, a great deal more armor plate than has been suggested by any bill before Congress?

Secretary DANIELS. We are not now asking Congress for any more than were put in the estimates.

Senator PAGE. But if there should be a prospect of an immediate war, would not those estimates be doubled, or trebled, perhaps?

Secretary DANIELS. Of course.

Senator PAGE. Then is it not possible that it will be better to postpone the proposed legislation with regard to an armor-plate plant for a year and continue the present status of the parties that are now manufacturing armor until we see what situation is going to confront us in a month or so?

Secretary DANIELS. If it were true we were going to need a great deal more than we have estimated for, then the private plants could not meet our needs, and we would need a plant all the more.

Senator PAGE. We should not have that for a year or two, perhaps, and we want now to stimulate and encourage the existing plants to continue their operations and make a large amount of armor plate in the immediate future.

Secretary DANIELS. They have a certain limit to their production now.

Senator PAGE. I think 32,000 tons is the limit stated.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Secretary, you said something about the advantage to the Government of preserving secrets if we had our own armor-plate factory. I would like to have you elaborate that.

Secretary DANIELS. I mean by that there have been a number of improvements. Of course the Navy's experts are studying how to improve all war munitions. I was illustrating this by the torpedo. I think it would be very valuable for the Government to have its own factory, where its own experts could experiment in making armor plate.

Senator JOHNSON. And preserve the secrets?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; and try to produce something better. I think that is a very strong argument in favor of having a Government plant. That does not affect the size of the plant, however.

Senator PAGE. And how long, Mr. Secretary, would it be before that plant could be put in operation, if this bill should pass?

Secretary DANIELS. At the best, 18 months.

Senator PAGE. I think the testimony of one of the admirals was it would be nearly twice that. Am I right about that?

Senator LODGE. Yes, sir.

Secretary DANIELS. Two years, I would say, would be nearer right if we had the money available and proceeded at once.

Senator PENROSE. From two to five years the estimates run, I think, according to the testimony.

Senator CHILTON. Mr. Secretary, if you have not explained to the committee, I would like to have you explain now your opinion and give us the benefit of your judgment as to the relative difference between putting up a 10,000-ton plant and a 20,000-ton plant. I know there is a difference in cost. I believe you estimated $230 a ton for the 20,000-ton plant. I mean, to take into consideration all the factors. It might be inadvisable for us to destroy or put out of operation the plants that are now in existence. You must have studied that. Which do you think it would be best for the Government to do now, granting it was determined to build some kind of a plant?

Secretary DANIELS. As I said just now, my estimate was for a 10,000-ton plant, and the advantage of a 20,000-ton plant is that you could get armor plate at about $32 a ton cheaper.

Senator CHILTON. Well, let us take the present situation as it exists now, taking all those factors into consideration. One of the main reasons you want a plant would be for the experimental tests you spoke of?

Secretary DANIELS. That is one of the main things, but one of the other big things is to get competition in prices.

Senator LODGE. But if the Government makes substantially all the armor plate it needs in a year in its own plant, of course, you would put the others all out of business. Do you think that would be a good thing?

Secretary DANIELS. Well, as I said just now, my recommendation was for a 10,000-ton plant at this time.

Senator LODGE. Exactly; you want to keep competition alive, with the possibility of expansion?

Secretary DANIELS. With the possibility of expansion. If we show on a 10,000-ton plant what I think we will, then it will be another question how much larger we should make it.

Senator SWANSON. Could a plant of 10,000 tons capacity be expanded to 20,000 tons capacity without the loss of much machinery?

Secretary DANIELS. Senator TILLMAN, you went into that more fully than I did.

The CHAIRMAN. My opinion is it is cheaper to build a larger plant, and I can not see where anything at all would be lost.

Senator SWANSON. I mean, if you should have a 10,000-ton plant and afterwards the developments were such that you wanted to increase it to a 20,000-ton plant, could it be done without very great loss on the 10,000-ton plant?

The CHAIRMAN. You would only lose time, in addition to the money necessary to expand it.

Secretary DANIELS. It is just a matter of more units.

Senator SWANSON. So there would not be any material loss in the expansion?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I say there would be no loss whatever, but it would be a saving to build a larger plant in the beginning.

Secretary DANIELS. Undoubtedly.

Senator SWANSON. Have you ever had any proposition made to the Navy Department for the sale of any one of these plants at a reasonable price?

Secretary DANIELS. No. A year ago or more, talking to these gentlemen, one of them said, "Well, if the Government is going into this we might as well sell our plant." But it was in a casual conversation; there has been no proposition.

Senator PAGE. Is it not possible, Mr. Secretary, that this is an inopportune time to make the change, in view of what confronts us now?

Secretary DANIELS. Why, I think, in view of the larger program, this is the time to do it.

Senator PHELAN. What has been the effect of the Government's manufacture of gunpowder on prices and quality?

Secretary DANIELS. When the Government began to manufacture smokeless powder it paid to the private company 80 cents a pound.

Later, some years ago, Representative SHERLEY began an investigation as to what ought to be the price—about six years ago; I won't say exactly the time. After that investigation Congress fixed the price at 53 cents. We did not manufacture much smokeless powder then. The Sixty-third Congress increased the capacity of the powder factory, so that now we can manufacture, beginning the 1st of March, 6,000,000 pounds a year. It costs us 24 and a fraction cents to manufacture it; that is, the first cost, not counting investment and overhead charges. Counting that, it costs about 35 or 36 cents.

Senator LODGE. That includes everything?

Secretary DANIELS. That includes everything. It is 25 cents if you do not charge anything except the mere cost of the powder; charging everything, it costs 35 or 36 cents.

Senator CHILTON. Factory cost?

Secretary DANIELS. Factory cost.

Senator SWANSON. What has been the experience in connection with the manufacture of guns?

Senator LODGE. I would like the Secretary to finish this matter.

Secretary DANIELS. We can manufacture in the Navy, beginning the 1st of March, all the powder we need in the regular orderly operation as the General Board has prescribed. We can make it all, as I say, at a cost of 25 cents net, or 36 cents with the overhead charges, a very great saving, you see.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the experience of the Government with the lasting qualities of smokeless powder?

Secretary DANIELS. It lasts longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Can it be kept in stock and stored up?

Secretary DANIELS. Every few years we rework this powder, but Admiral Strauss has been able to make it so much better we do not have to work it so often. About once in three years we rework this powder. It used to be worked oftener.

Senator PHELAN. You make it at 35 cents?

Secretary DANIELS. Including all overhead charges; yes.

Senator PHELAN. What is the commercial market price for large quantities of powder?

Secretary DANIELS. Congress fixed the price that we should pay when we buy it outside at 53 cents.

Senator PHELAN. But what do the manufacturers sell it to outside purchasers at?

Secretary DANIELS. I do not know, Senator. A dollar a pound I think they are charging now.

Senator CHILTON. I have heard that.

Secretary DANIELS. My understanding was the Du Pont Co. had a contract abroad for millions of pounds at $1 a pound.

Senator PHELAN. The same quality of powder?

Secretary DANIELS. I think they make the same quality of powder.

Senator PHELAN. You now manufacture all you need in the orderly routine operation of the Navy?

Secretary DANIELS. We will be in March.

Senator LODGE. But we do not make enough for war?

Secretary DANIELS. No; not for war.

Senator PHELAN. Does it deteriorate by storage?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; about every three years we have to rework it.

Senator PHELAN. What else does the Government manufacture?

Secretary DANIELS. Torpedoes, some types of guns——

Senator SWANSON. While you are speaking of guns, what was the cost of guns before the Government manufactured them, and what does it cost now to manufacture these guns?

Secretary DANIELS. I would like to look into that. As a general rule, if we can manufacture them cheaper than we can buy them outside we manufacture them, and generally we have been able to do so. Sometimes we have made a contract outside at a lower price than we could manufacture at, but we have made a considerable saving as a whole. If you will let me have a little time to look up the figures, I will put that in the hearings. We have generally made them cheaper than we can buy them outside.

Senator PHELAN. I think this information is very interesting, in view of the fact that a larger part of the opposition to the program of preparedness comes from men who think that those who manufacture munitions are always stirring up trouble and inspiring the war spirit for the purpose of selling their wares. You say that all the powder used in the ordinary orderly routine of the Navy's operations is manufactured by the Government plant?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Senator PHELAN. And what percentage of the small arms?

Secretary DANIELS. Not a very large per cent; a very small per cent.

Senator PHELAN. Torpedoes?

Secretary DANIELS. We manufacture torpedoes, over half.

Senator PHELAN. Then if you manufacture your armor plate and build your ships in navy yards that objection to preparedness would be answered?

Secretary DANIELS. I think it would be a good proposition for the Government in every way.

Senator PHELAN. And in the proportion that you do manufacture these things as a Government, in that proportion would the sentiment against preparedness be allayed?

Secretary DANIELS. That part of the preparedness sentiment that comes from those who get money out of it.

Senator PENROSE. Would that satisfy Henry Ford and William Jennings Bryan, do you think? If that was eliminated, would they be for preparedness then?

Senator PHELAN. It would probably deprive them of one of their arguments.

Senator PAGE. Would there be any material embarrassment, were we to have war now with a foreign power, in securing the proper amount and quality of powder?

Secretary DANIELS. No; I think not; because our plant and the private plants have been so much engaged recently. But our country always is in a position that if we had war we would have to buy munitions of all kinds.

Senator PENROSE. Mr. Secretary, on that point, if the Government goes into this on the basis of manufacturing all the munitions they require, where will they find private manufacturers able to manufacture munitions when a larger demand occurs in case of war?

Secretary DANIELS. I have not advocated the manufacture of all, Senator.

Senator PENROSE. Take your battleships, your armor plate, your guns, your powder—even Admiral Strauss declared that the policy of France had been a failure in the manufacture of powder. If a war should occur, perchance, an enormous demand will be created and these individuals will have disappeared like the buffalo.

Secretary DANIELS. I do not think we ought to pay excessive prices because of that fear.

Senator PHELAN. One of the objects of your plan is to determine the cost of these things?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; and this is true: Take the question of powder—that has now been turned into a science. For a long time we manufactured only a fourth, or a third, or a half, and we bought additional powder, and we had competition between outside and inside. Now, our experts can make it perfectly; and it would be a very unwise policy for this Government to pay 53 cents when it can make it for 35 or 36.

Take the question of shipbuilding, for instance. I really think we get better results if we have some built at navy yards and some built by private companies, because we get the competition between our own experts and outside experts.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. Do you not think that is the case in regard to armor plate, that we could manufacture some and leave enough for outside parties to encourage them to keep in a prepared state?

Secretary DANIELS. That may be the wisest course, Senator.

Senator CHILTON. That was one of your recommendations; that was one of the considerations.

Secretary DANIELS. In my estimates I estimated that we should make a 10,000-ton plant. That was my recommendation. It is much better as a matter of economy to make it 20,000 tons.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. It might be better possibly to pay a little more and have assistance when you need it, from outside parties, but to build a plant of 10,000 tons would enable you to get at what ought to be paid for it, and it would also stop the monopoly, if there is a monopoly, and it also would enable you to have the secrets which you think are very valuable, and at the same time not destroy the private industries altogether.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, as to this proposition for a 20,000-ton plant, the estimate of cost is based upon its running all the while—three shifts. It is not customary to run Government plants 24 hours in a day. Therefore, unless there is an emergency, we could reduce the time of manufacturing armor to eight hours a day, and jog along in that way, and the cost would not be as much as we are now paying.

Mr. BARBA. It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, to run an armor plant eight hours a day. It is not physically possible.

Mr. GRACE. The operations require continuous work.

Mr. BARBA. The operations require absolutely continuous performance 24 hours a day 7 days a week.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the heat has to be maintained?

Mr. BARBA. Yes, sir. I instanced a week ago in my testimony one operation, which is common to every armor plant, which requires from 18 to 25 days' continuous operation at a temperature of 2,000° F. without cessation. You can not do that on an eight-hour basis.

The CHAIRMAN. That is one of the special parts of the manufacture, however.

Mr. BARBA. You can do that in the case of machines where the tools may stand idle.

The CHAIRMAN. My judgment would be it would be possible for the Government armor factory to run on those processes which are not necessarily continuous in such a way as not to make it necessary, and you could get the same results, and you could expand and run 24 hours a day in an emergency.

Mr. BARBA. But, Senator TILLMAN, where does your cost go under such an operation as that? When you are working 8 hours a day and the plant is idle 16 hours a day, everything stops more than 16 hours a day. It takes longer than 8 hours a day to pick up and get going. You need a little manufacturing experience, Senator, to show you the truth of these statements I am making to you.

Secretary DANIELS. You asked me just now about the guns. I find I have the facts in my testimony before the House committee last year. It cost something less than $60,000 to build a 14-inch gun. The Army is making 10 for us at a cost of about $61,000 apiece. We asked for bids on those 10 guns, and the Midvale and Bethlehem companies bid $79,000 apiece for them, a difference as against the Army price of approximately $18,000 and as against the Navy price of $19,000. That was for 14-inch guns.

Senator PHELAN. Of course that question of cost is subject to change when you add in the interest on investment and overhead charges?

Secretary DANIELS. All those things enter in, of course.

Senator PHELAN. There is no standardization of statistics, it seems to me.

Senator PENROSE. That is the whole trouble.

Senator LODGE. The costs are almost valueless.

Senator PENROSE. Figures will prove anything about the cost of Government work.

Secretary DANIELS. Well, figures prove as much about Government work as about private work.

Senator PENROSE. I did not go that far; I am willing to admit that, too.

Secretary DANIELS. These figures, though, absolutely show the cost to the taxpayers.

Senator SWANSON. But this was after bids. Bids were made for 14-inch guns, and the navy yard had all its plant, and the Army had its plant and overhead charges, and a bid was made by the Army to construct ten 14-inch guns for the Navy, and the difference between the Army price and the price submitted by the outside bidders was $18,000 on each gun.

Senator PHELAN. That is due to the fact that the Government is not paying dividends to stockholders.

Senator PENROSE. And not paying taxes.

Secretary DANIELS. But do not forget we have equally large overhead charges. The leave, liability, and sickness amount to from 10 to 12 per cent, and outside companies do not have these charges.

Mr. KING. We have every bit of that.

Secretary DANIELS. Some of it. They do not give the leave that we give; they do not have those outside charges that we have. So you must consider both; I do not mean to say they equalize each other, but you must consider both.

Senator PHELAN. There is one thing certain, that the Government does not pay more than they would have to pay if they employed private concerns.

Secretary DANIELS. In most instances they pay less, and when they pay more they get it outside. Now, when we gave these bids out, if Midvale and Bethlehem had bid lower for these guns they would have gotten them.

Mr. KING. Would you have shut down your plant, sir?

Secretary DANIELS. Sometimes it might possibly be better to temporarily stop a portion of the plant if we could get them cheaper.

Mr. BARBA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention to a fact about the manufacture of small guns.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean rifles?

Mr. BARBA. Four-inch rifles, 5-inch rifles, and such as are going on our smaller naval units That is the type of gun which can be produced most quickly and rapidly in time of stress and emergency. The Midvale Steel Co. has not had an order for these small guns in three years, due to the fact that the Washington Navy Yard and the Watervliet Arsenal have taken every gun the department had to give out; and the Midvale Steel Co.'s tools and equipment are idle so far as those guns are concerned. The men, the expert workmen on lock mechanism, are scattered and are not any longer in our employ, and to-day we could not make those guns.

Senator PHELAN. Are you making those guns for foreign order?

Mr. BARBA. Not at present, sir.

Secretary DANIELS. But you are taking orders?

Mr. BARBA. We hope to.

Secretary DANIELS. The Midvale Co. declined to take any foreign orders until it recently sold out, and since then it has taken orders.

Mr. BARBA. We hope to take orders for relatively small guns—and large ones.

Secretary DANIELS. Of course, whenever we can make guns cheaper ourselves we make them; when we find it cheaper to go outside and get them we go out outside, like any other business concern.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Secretary, is there not legislation to prevent your doing that?

Secretary DANIELS. We are compelled by certain legislation to keep our plants working, if we can do so economically. I have forgotten the exact words of the legislation. Before that it often happened the Government factory was standing idle and the contracts were awarded outside. Congress put a provision in the act that we should keep the Government factory busy.

Mr. BARBA. The purpose of my remarks about the small guns was to show the certain atrophy that comes on a plant that is allowed to fall into disuse.

Senator PHELAN. The gentleman says he has orders, if I understand him, for foreign guns?

Mr. BARBA. Not at present; we have made bids. But it will require us to overhaul our plants and reassemble our crews before we can undertake to accept those contracts.

Senator PHELAN. That would be very advantageous to you—to keep your plant going?

Mr. BARBA. Yes; and that is the reason why we do it. We would far rather have our plant filled with the work for which it was designed.

Senator PHELAN. Do you think your foreign orders would probably enable your plant and all other plants in this country to keep in operation?

Mr. BARBA. Yes, a short time; but against the policy of the United States.

Senator PHELAN. Are you familiar with the export trade in munitions?

Mr. BARBA. Yes; pretty well.

Senator PHELAN. Will you state what percentage of the whole amount of munitions goes from the factories of the United States to European battle fields?

Mr. BARBA. It is almost impossible, Senator, to give you such a figure as that.

Senator PHELAN. Is it more than 5 per cent?

Mr. BARBA. Yes, indeed.

Senator PHELAN. It has been stated it was about 5 per cent of the whole amount consumed on the other side.

Mr. BARBA. I think Mr. Grace can give you a very much more accurate statement than I, because I heard him make a remark the other day which showed he had some information. And as he has manufactured very much more in the way of munitions than we have at Midvale I would be glad to retire in his favor. I am certain there is a very large proportion of the stuff being used abroad coming from America to-day, but the plants were largely built as emergency plants. They were remodeled car foundries, remodeled railroad shops, factories of all kinds. And they have, of course, figured on amortizing every bit of their new equipment on the cessation of war orders, and they, of course, will desire to return to their standard line of business.

Senator PHELAN. That is irrelevant anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to submit this bill to the committee and get a vote on it.

Senator PENROSE. Don't you think, Senator, we had better do that in executive session?

Mr. GRACE. If the hearings are about concluded. I would like to have a few minutes to make one more statement, if it is convenient.

The CHAIRMAN. If Secretary Daniels has finished.

Secretary DANIELS. I believe I have nothing more to add.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Will the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply wish to ask whether the Secretary indicated that the bids of the three companies were at that time identically the same when submitted a second time?

Mr. ASHURST. If my memory serves me correctly, they reduced their bids and the contract was divided among the three. In the bidding there was absolutely no pretense of competition. The bids were all reduced and accepted at the reduced figures.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is aware that the Navy Department adopted a policy of dividing the work and divided the bids to make it an equal amount to each.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Before the Senator leaves the evidence, I should like to ask him if any explanation was made by anyone as to why these gentlemen sold armor plate cheaper to foreign nations than to their own country?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, although I have not carefully read all the hearings, my remembrance is that there is no explanation in the hearings as to why it was that they sold it to Russia, Italy, and Japan at a much cheaper price than to our own Government.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator another question? The newspapers stated that notice of some kind was served upon the committee that if an armor-plate factory was to be built by the Government or the construction in any way commenced the manufacturers would raise the price of armor plate to the Government $200 per ton. Is there evidence of that kind or is it a newspaper story?

Mr. ASHURST. I saw the article in the newspapers, but not finding it in the testimony I refrained in my address from adverting to it.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator finds nothing of that kind in the testimony?

Mr. ASHURST. I did not find anything in the hearings. If such a statement was made, of course it was a most offensive and stupid thing for anyone to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] comes back and makes his own speech, I wish he would ask him the question. He is the man who notified the committee of that fact. He said they would raise their price $200 a ton.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think no one has suggested that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] was voicing the views of any of the manufacturers when he made that observation. I have seen it suggested that he made the observation, but I imagine that he did it entirely on his own responsibility.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arizona yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield first to the Senator from Illinois, as he rose first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I take the liberty to make a response to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa and to say to him that when investigations were on touching the question of the armor plate being sold to foreign nations at a price less than that sold to our Government, I happened to bear an insignificant relation to the query, being then a Member of the House and serving in rather an incidental capacity. The present chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate [Mr. TILLMAN], then a Member of the Senate, began the conflict here in this body, as the Senator from Arizona in his opening address stated. A few Members of the House, including myself, assumed to open an inquiry in the House. I recall that this statement was made in answer to the two inquiries. One was that what was sold to Russia was of a quality that did not comply with the specifications of our own Government for our own use and therefore was useless to the United States. Second, as to the other Governments, that it was a surplus, a matter which there had been no demand for, and it was to save a loss to themselves. Such were the only responses we received.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Owing to the time that has elapsed, I shall not ask the Senator to yield to me now.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want to lose the right to the floor, but I cheerfully yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I understand from the tenor of the Senator's remarks and his quotations that this evil practice of noncompetitive bidding was really the fault of the Government under former administrations and not the fault of the bidders at all. It was encouraged by the Government under former administrations, was it not?

Mr. ASHURST. There was no doubt of that.

Mr. MYERS. But the present administration is not indulging in that reprehensible practice?

Mr. ASHURST. That is very true.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator ought to make it plain that the present administration is not indulging in any such reprehensible practice.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Montana for calling my attention to that point.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. The point I really wanted to bring out more clearly was, because of the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], that it was the policy of the Navy Department to divide the contracts among different bidders. It is not the present policy of the Government to do so under this administration.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is interesting to be told by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the present administration is purer than the Republican administration.

Mr. MYERS. I simply asked the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. What was done in that regard during the years of the Cleveland administration?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to answer?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, whether Democrat or Republican, all, I think, respect the memory of Grover Cleveland. His administration was the pioneer in the movement looking toward securing cheaper armor plate. It was under his administration that one of these companies now charging the Government extortionate prices was fined $150,000 for palming off on the Government fraudulent, defective, treacherous armor plate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator has not answered the question asked by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ASHURST. I will try to answer it. I do not want to dodge it.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say that the present Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, had received bids for armor plate at the price of $454 a ton; that he thought the price was too high and asked for other bids; and that the three bidders named by him then bid $440 a ton. Then the Secretary of War followed the same practice that was followed by other administrations—by dividing the amount of armor plate purchased by the Government among the three concerns.

Mr. ASHURST. In answer let me read again——

Mr. SMOOT. Is not that correct?

Mr. ASHURST. Let me read what the honorable Secretary himself said:

> Secretary DANIELS. 1913. I rejected all these bids on the ground that there had been no competition. Later I had a talk with the gentlemen representing these three companies and told them that we wished competition and that I could not understand how they could hit upon identically the same figure to a cent. Their answer was this: The Midvale people said that some years before that, when bids were offered, they had made the lowest bid but were not awarded the contract and that the department adopted the policy of dividing the contract between the three concerns; and they said, of course, "Why should we bid a lower figure if it is going to be awarded one-third to each of us at the same price?" But I advertised again, and they came down to $440 per ton, enabling the department to effect a saving of $111,000 on that contract.
> Since then we have had bidding which has varied very little and we have had, of course, practically no competition.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator knows that the contracts were awarded to the three companies who bid, and for this reason the Midvale Co. could not produce in the time specified in the call for bids the amount of armor plate that the Government asked for, and in order to get the amount of armor plate it required, the Secretary of War had to divide the bids among the three bidders.

Mr. ASHURST. Is the Senator talking about 1903 or 1913?

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about 1913.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no evidence indicating that the Midvale Co. could not furnish all the armor plate.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not generally understood——

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. That the armor-plate plants of the United States are built with a view of producing the amount of armor plate that the Government of the United States requires? That is as I understand it, Mr. President.

Of course the policy was in the past to divide the purchases among the three companies. I think the Senator also knows that in the past the Government, in receiving bids for powder, in many cases decided to award the bid to more than one company. The Government felt that when it went into the manufacture of powder it would be very unwise for the Government to manufacture all of the powder needed for the Government, because if that were the case and trouble came and a great demand made on the Government for munitions of war, if all the private institutions had been driven out of the business the Government would find itself in a very helpless condition. That was the policy in relation to powder, and I understand the policy in relation to armor plate has been to encourage more than one firm to manufacture the same.

Mr. ASHURST. So far as I am advised, I am not aware that the policy of the Secretary of the Navy or of Congress has been to try to drive the manufacturers out of business, but the Secretary insists that the Government shall have its own plant, where it may manufacture 10,000 tons or 20,000 tons a year, so that it may procure its armor plate at a reasonable price and will not be forced to submit to extortion, and may, if it wishes, manufacture all its armor plate. The same is true as to powder.

Mr. SMOOT. My remarks to the Senator had no reference whatever to the question as to whether the Government at this time should enter into the manufacture of armor plate. My remarks only referred to the past policy of the Government in relation to the purchase of powder and also the purchase of armor plate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to rejoin to the remark made by the esteemed Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] by saying that when it is proven from the records that his party had been bad in the past I am quite willing for him to have the poor consolation of recording that the Democrats have been just as bad at times in the past, if he will couple with it the further fact that the Democrats have quit those practices and under this administration have put an end to all of the bad practices of the past of both political parties and have set a new standard of honesty in public matters.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. My view of the Democratic Party is that which was expressed by the old lady who said that her son was totally depraved and growing worse every day. [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. Just let me say a word. With all respect to my distinguished and beloved friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], when the Democratic Party merits his hearty condemnation it is entitled to a certificate of good character. [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. I accept the rejoinder made by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want to be discourteous, but I want to conclude as soon as possible.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one word, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

I did not intend my remarks to be discourteous.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator for information. He has been looking into this matter much more carefully than have I. It has been stated to me by parties whom I supposed knew something about the matter that foreign Governments were now paying more for armor plate than is the United States. Does the Senator know anything about that?

Mr. ASHURST. I am unable to supply that information. There are some data in the hearings with reference to it; but I did not deem it necessary to include them in my remarks.

Mr. President, surely we all may congratulate ourselves that the successful consummation of this legislation is about to be realized. The Nation cares very little for the expression of Senators; it cares very much as to what they do. The American people care but little as to what the Democratic Party or any other political party may say; the people care very much as to what a political party may do. The duty to create an armor-plate factory is before the party which has control in both Houses of Congress. Every mainspring and every motive that could influence a Senator to perform a patriotic act now calls upon him to vote for this bill. I have no criticism to make against any Senator who votes against this bill or views it differently from the way in which I do. He is doubtless just as sincere in his views as I am in mine; but, according to my view, it is our duty to pass this bill. The interests of this Government—interests sacred and stupendous—have been committed to us. Therefore we should in all things demonstrate that we have the ability, skill, and courage to meet those duties in a high and noble way. Congress has investigated for over 20 years; now is the time for action.

When I first entered Congress I began to give attention to this matter, for I believed then, as I believe now, that the Government should not be left to depend wholly upon private parties for its supply of those articles which it might, unhappily, be required to use for its defense.

Another and an important reason why the Government should construct its own armor plate is that under the present arrangements we have no knowledge whatever as to the class of armor plate that is being furnished to the Government. We are left to depend almost wholly upon the patriotism of the armor-plate makers. If they see fit to do as some of them did two decades ago, furnish the Government with armor plate full of "bubbles" and blowholes, we have no adequate means of knowing whether the armor is sound and perfect or treacherous and defective until that day when it may be put to the test. After an engagement has commenced and we find that some of our dreadnaughts have been covered with defective armor, it is too late to do aught else than utter vain regrets and curse ourselves for not taking precaution and provision to be absolutely sure that defective armor plate was not furnished to us.

It will be recalled that one of these companies, over 20 years ago, was fined nearly $150,000 for palming off fraudulent armor plate upon the Government.

I have now said, Mr. President, all I wish to say about the manufacture of armor for vessels of the Navy. I will conclude my remarks on that subject by venturing the prophecy that the bill to erect an armor-plate factory will soon become a law.

I will now advert to another matter equally as important, if not more important than even the armor-plate factory, and that is the necessity for a Government plant for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. It is a very happy circumstance that I find another distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has introduced a bill to provide for the construction of such a factory. As I said in the beginning of my remarks, South Carolina has furnished many statesmen to the Nation. We have evidence here that her loyal and devoted sons have been in the forefront of these great movements. I advert to Senate bill 4971, introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], proposing to appropriate $15,000,000 for the purpose of constructing a plant for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen; and my attention also is very happily called to a bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] on March 9, 1916, proposing to appropriate a sum of money to allow a board of Army engineers to search for, locate, and make a report upon the necessity and feasibility of plants for the fixation of nitrogen. That bill, as well as the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, exhibits statesmanship. What they may say we will listen to; but it is what a Senator does—what he does for the present and the future—not for his own particular State especially, but for the whole country, that measures him as a statesman, and I say the Senator from Montana

[Mr. MYERS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] exhibited statesmanship when they introduced those bills, and I hope they will press them to a successful conclusion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. In that connection, I wish to call attention to the fact that my bill provides for inquiring into the feasibility of locating a plant at the town of Polson, Mont., where there is a splendid water-power site withdrawn by the Government, and where all the facilities for such a work, I believe, are at hand and may be found convenient.

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator will press his bill diligently.

One of the chief reasons why I am inclined to favor the Ferris bill, House bill 408, which is now the unfinished business, is that I have the hope that, if that bill or some similar bill becomes a law, sufficient quantities of hydroelectric power may be generated so that atmospheric nitrogen may be manufactured, for the necessity of nitrogen now is becoming just as great as the necessity for food and water.

The data which I employ to-day with reference to the fixation of nitrogen I secured from a lecture delivered by Mr. Henry J. Pierce, of Washington State, and from various governmental publications, which I have been perusing for the past month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that a great many men eminent in their profession as chemists are investigating this very subject?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, indeed.

Mr. GALLINGER. And is it not a fact that already there have been some plants constructed and that the operation of getting nitrogen from the air has been proved something of a success by private parties?

Mr. ASHURST. Absolutely a success. If the Senator will permit me, I am going to deal with that subject somewhat in detail a little later, and I will answer his question more in detail as I proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. My thought simply is whether we are going to put the Government into all kinds of business. The taking of nitrogen from the air has been proven a possible thing by private parties and by the investment of private capital. Now, if we are going to put the Government into this business, the Senator can think of a hundred other kinds of businesses that the Government can engage in. I do not know but that the Senator believes that it would be a good thing for the Government to take over all the business of the country.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not. But, Mr. President, one of the chief arguments against the erection of an armor-plate factory was that we would drive out capital already invested. It is a potent argument; but, so far as I know, no considerable amount of capital, if, indeed, any capital, has been invested in the United States with respect to the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. A plant was intended to be located in the southern part of our country, but it went to Niagara Falls, Canada, instead of Niagara Falls, United States. I do not know that there are any such investments at all in this country; so the argument that we are driving out private capital on this score is not tenable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not make that argument at all. If I were to express a thought on that point, I would say that if private capital can not develop that industry I do not believe the Government can.

Mr. ASHURST. But, Mr. President, other Governments have done so. England has her hydroelectric plants in Iceland for the extraction of nitrogen from the air. Germany does not import any nitrogen for the manufacture of explosives; she takes it from the air. There are great plants of this kind in Norway. It is absolutely a success, beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

Mr. GALLINGER. But does not the Senator think that, if this is an enterprise that promises fair returns, the enterprising business men of the United States will go into it and make it a success?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, Congress has not given to business and to the capital which would be required to erect these plants sufficient law under which they could make development. That is the very reason why the distinguished junior Senator and the distinguished senior Senator from Montana have so earnestly pressed the Ferris bill, in the hope and in the belief that some adequate legislation will be afforded, so that this may be brought about.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, the burden does not rest upon the private citizen or upon the capitalist, but upon Congress, which has closed the door to the possibility of this development. Is that it?

Mr. ASHURST. The conservation movement of some seven or eight years ago closed the door to all kinds of development, and we are trying to have it unlocked and opened up.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I wish to ask one further question. Supposing the door is opened, that the conservation bills are passed, and that sufficient hydroelectric power can be developed, does the Senator not think that the enterprising, progressive people of this country and the capital of this country will engage in the manufacture of nitrogen from the air?

Mr. ASHURST. I think so; I hope they will.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to refer to a matter suggested to me by the queries of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the proposition for the Government to construct and operate nitrate works at Polson, in the State of Montana, as contemplated by the bill introduced by my colleague, does not present the ordinary question of the Government going into a business enterprise. When it does, it must, of course, provide itself with all of the facilities; it must go out into the market and buy them. Here is a case where it owns all that is necessary in the way of power possibilities. Of course the first requisite to a nitrate plant is cheap power. Probably such a plant could not be made profitable where the power would cost more than $12 to $15 a horsepower. Likewise there must be a great quantity of it. A project of that kind can not be profitably or economically carried on unless at least 100,000 horsepower is available. At Polson there is a matter of from 200,000 to 250,000 horsepower available, the Government already owning the land. Now, it is a question as to whether we shall dispose of that land to private individuals under the provisions of the bill which is now the unfinished business, if it shall become a law, and allow private individuals to utilize that power and produce the nitrate and then buy the nitrate from the private company in order to supply the Army with proper ammunition, or whether the Government, having the basis already upon which the production rests, would be justified in going and building the plant.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I will now read a clipping from the New York American of March 12, 1916:

AMERICAN SHIP SEIZED BY BRITISH OFF CHILE COAST—STEAMER EDNA, LADEN WITH NITRATE, IS TAKEN BY CRUISER TO FALKLAND ISLANDS.

WASHINGTON, March 11.

The American steamer Edna, formerly the Mexican steamer Mazatlan, now owned by Sudden & Christenson, of San Francisco, has been captured by a British cruiser. She was taken to Port Stanley, Falkland Islands.

The Edna left San Francisco some time ago with a domestic cargo for the west coast of South America. Returning she was loaded with nitrate, valuable in munitions manufacture. Her destination was Barbados and Martinique, and she left a Chilean port February 27, with orders to coal at Talpal, Chile. She never reached the latter port.

No reason for her seizure was given, but it is assumed the nature of her cargo caused the capture.

Mr. President, in discussing the preparedness question we must not be oblivious of the fact that if we had a contest with a great naval power it could seize the Chilean nitrate deposits or interrupt our communication by ships between the Chilean deposits and this country, and cause our country a great deal of distress and trouble, without coming within 3,000 miles of us, simply by shutting off our supply of nitrate. I call the attention of Senators to the significant line in the newspaper clipping, as follows:

Returning she—

was loaded with nitrate, valuable in munitions manufacture.

Nitrogen comprises four-fifths of the atmosphere, and is a constituent of all organized life and tissues. It is a colorless, tasteless, odorless, gaseous, nonmetallic element. We live in it, we breathe it, we eat it, and it constitutes a portion of our human frame. It is absolutely necessary to the existence of animal and plant life. Without fixed nitrogen the earth would soon become an uninhabited desert waste. While the atmosphere contains an exhaustless supply of nitrogen, it being estimated that 20,000,000 tons exist above each square mile of the earth's surface, yet 90 per cent of the plant life that lives in it does not absorb it and the remaining 10 per cent absorbs but a small proportion of that which it requires. The world has been dependent for most of its supplies of fixed nitrogen upon the nitrate of soda beds of Chile, where, during some convulsion of nature at some remote past time, the soda absorbed quantities of nitrogen from the air. During 1913 the United States imported 625,000 tons of Chilean nitrates, valued at $21,000,000, upon which the Chilean export duty was 60 per cent. The richest nitrate beds of Chile, however, will be practically exhausted by 1925; and were it not for the discovery of processes whereby it is now possible, with the aid of electric energy, to obtain supplies of fixed nitrogen from the atmosphere, the world would stand in imminent deadly peril and the perpetuation of the human race would be endangered. It is a wonderful providence that perpetual and inexhaustible supplies of nitrogen may be obtained from the atmosphere by the use of electric energy obtained from our water powers, whose flow is also constant and everlasting, and that thus our limited supplies of fuel, laid aside by nature, may be conserved for other uses.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] referred to private capital entering this field, which has now passed the empirical stage and has become a fact. The necessity of securing potash for the manufacture of munitions of war is no greater than for another industry quite as potential in our preparedness plans, namely, the sutlers' department, supplied by the agricultural interests of this country. The fields of the Atlantic seaboard from Maine to Florida are absolutely dependent upon the presence of potash, nitrogen, and phosphoric acid, and, of course, those three ingredients enter more largely than any others into the manufacture of explosives; in fact, they constitute the bulk of them.

This country to-day is largely dependent for its supply of available chemical potash upon the potash wells of Germany. From September, 1913, to October, 1915, the price of muriate of potash rose from $40 a ton to $500 a ton in the wholesale market of this country, and to-day it is without price at all. We stand face to face with that fact, although from the coast of Alaska to the southern point of southern California there are untold millions of pounds of potash in the form of kelp which is easily accessible and has only to be dried, ground, and sacked to be ready for use. The chemical process of extracting the liquor from which the crystals of the potash are to be obtained is comparatively simple; but because the field is large and competition might be certain and huge profits are not in sight, except by holding up the agricultural interests of this country, nobody has entered that field.

At the proper time, in connection with the bill which I have introduced, I shall call attention to the fact that the patriotic, progressive sons of America are more patriotic and more progressive when they can hold up their fellow Americans. That kelp field lies there now easy of access, but no one may preempt the field and get a monopoly to hold up the agricultural interests, and therefore nobody enters it. If I can possibly do so, I shall try to get this Government to enter it to save the agricultural interests first and foremost from being absolutely impoverished, in my section at least, and in order to enable the Government not only to defend us from enemies abroad by providing for an adequate supply of munitions and explosives, but to take care of our friends by promoting the fertility of the soil.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to refer to another matter. The Senator from South Carolina has told you of the desperate situation in which this country is to-day by reason of the fact that it is entirely dependent upon Germany for its supply of potash. The celebrated Searles Lake deposits, in the State of California, can easily supply any possible domestic demand, but there is no law to-day under which those deposits can be appropriated. On the first day of the present session of Congress I introduced a bill looking to the disposition of deposits of that character, and in the hope that it might speedily come before the Senate I asked that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, of which I have the honor to be chairman. It was, however, referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I advised the Senate at that time as to what the significance of that move was. The bill is still there. I understand it is going to be before the Senate soon, however.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I gather from the suggestions of the learned Senator from Montana that we have an abundance of these products that are so essential to agriculture and to military affairs, but the Government has tied the matter up in such a way that private capital can not enter upon their production. Now, if the Government has done that, it strikes me as most extraordinary that we should step in and put the Government in the business? Why not loosen the hold that the Government has thrown around these matters?

I want further to add that it is inconceivable to me, knowing the genius of the American people, the enterprise of the American people, the capital that American citizens can command, that there are these fields of nitrates with such fabulous profits in sight, and that the private citizen will not enter. I can not conceive of it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I can not speak for the condition of affairs with reference to the deposits of potash in the State which the Senator from Montana represents, but, in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, I want to say that I was startled when the figures by a bureau of this Government were sent to me, upon my inquiry, as to the possible supply and cost of the production of commercial potash. They referred particularly to the kelp beds within the 3-mile limit from Alaska down as far as Southern California. The reason assigned by them why these almost inexhaustible kelp beds, rich in potash, had not been exploited was because they could not be monopolized. Potash is one of the ingredients that enters into the composition of explosives as well as nitrogen. In addition to potash, they state that 2½ per cent of the chemicals extracted from kelp is pure nitrate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall delay the Senator from Arizona but for a word in reference to the statement of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] as to the available source of potash on the Pacific coast in the kelp beds. I will say that it is a matter of very recent discovery that those beds of so-called giant kelp contain a considerable amount of potash, and that, I believe, accounts for the fact that they have not been more utilized.

I take advantage of this occasion to advertise the fact that a short time ago I secured an appropriation, through the courtesy of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of $9,000, which has been used by the Agricultural Department in printing maps of the surveys which the department has made of those kelp beds on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I was speaking of our lack of large quantities of fixed nitrogen or saltpeter. What the Senators say as to potash I have no doubt is true.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say at this time in reference to the bill to which my colleague [Mr. WALSH] made reference, the mineral-land leasing bill, that I expect it very soon to be reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. The Committee has not expedited the consideration of the bill as fast as I should have liked; nevertheless I have pressed that bill and other business of the committee with all of my power, continuously and assiduously, this winter. Owing to the very slow rate at which the business of the Senate has progressed at this session, the nature of the bills which have been before it, and the fact that practically all the time of the Senate has been occupied with important administration measures, I hardly see how, even if the bill referred to by my colleague had been reported out of the committee before now, it could have been considered by the Senate before this time. Of course that does not excuse any delay of the committee. I confidently assert that the Senate Committee on Public Lands has more work, handles more business, and has more demands upon its time the year round than has any other committee of the Senate. The demands upon it this winter have been simply enormous, beyond conception; hearings, correspondence, sittings without end. I have done the best I could under the enormous pressure of work.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no doubt of that fact.

Mr. MYERS. I have struggled very hard this winter to expedite the business of the committee; I have done my best, but, as I say, matters have not progressed as rapidly as I would have liked. I am glad to say, however, that I believe that the bill of my colleague will be reported out with a favorable report in a very short while. It is only one of very many highly important bills which have been before my committee this winter, each of which has consumed much time and been the recipient of great labor. I arrive at my office at the Capitol every morning at 7 o'clock, and seldom retire before midnight, and every minute of the time between those hours, except when at my meals, is devoted to official business. I am expediting the arduous work of the committee as much as possible.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the very fact that the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is the chairman of that committee is sufficient evidence to us that it is a diligent and hard-worked body of Senators and is assiduously performing its duty.

Mr. President, I should like to conclude without further interruption, as I have already held the Senate too long.

As I was about to say, nitrogen, in the form of nitric acid, is the principal constituent of explosives, such as guncotton, dynamite, and smokeless powder. We are annually producing about 250,000 tons of explosives, valued at $40,000,000, and we pay $23,000,000 for the raw materials that enter into them, most of which are imported. Had it not been for the discovery of the nitrate fields of Chile, the explosive industry, as it is known to-day, would have been impossible; and, as coal and minerals could not have been mined without the use of explosives, the development in mining and transportation, which has characterized the last half century, could not have been made.

In case of war we would be almost entirely dependent upon foreign nations for our supply of nitrogen for the manufacture of powder, and we would be practically defenseless unless we could obtain it from other nations. If the country with whom we were at war should be strong enough to seize the nitrate deposits of Chile, or to prevent shipments to this country, it would leave us helpless, in spite of our 100,000,000 of people and our Army and Navy. We would be forced to commandeer all sources of nitrogen, including fertilizer, and it might come about that some of our agricultural regions could no longer be devoted to food production, even though the scene of conflict never penetrated to them. The War Department is greatly concerned over this weak point in our national defense, and writers who are authorities upon the subject, from the military standpoint, urge the immediate development of our water powers, and establishment of atmospheric nitrogen plants, in order to insure the production of our requirements of nitrogen within the borders of our own country; and they strongly recommend that the nitrogen plants be so strategically located throughout the country as to be reasonably well protected against attack, in case of foreign invasion. Lindley M. Garrison, former Secretary of War, in his last annual report, said in vigorous language:

> Our only present source of supply [of nitrogen] is the natural nitrate beds of Chile, which in time of war might be shut off from us. Obviously in the matter of munitions, especially where the source is so limited and localized, we should neglect no provision so easily available as this to make the country self-sustaining. Plants producing nitrogen for industrial purposes in time of peace would be a great national asset in view of their availability to supply us with the necessary nitrogen in time of war.

In the early days of our country, especially during the Revolutionary War, most of the niter, or saltpeter, was obtained by scraping ancient deposits from the walls of caverns and caves, and even during the Civil War recourse was had to scrapings of ancient deposits from walls, cellars, and caverns for the manufacture of gunpowder for the Armies of both North and South.

I desire to read from the report of the Chief of Ordnance, Brig. Gen. William Crozier, to the Secretary of War, dated October 1, 1915, pages 25 and 26, the following:

> In a country of even the very large natural resources of the United States there are nevertheless some articles, essential in time of war, for which it is dependent upon foreign sources of supply. If these sources are so placed as to necessitate ocean transportation, the possibility of being cut off from them is great enough to call for provision against it. I do not know of any article of this class which, at the present time, should cause more concern with reference to the wartime supply than should nitric acid. The principal ingredient of the gunpowder of the present day, as well as of certain other explosives, is formed by treating ordinary cotton with nitric acid. The nitrogen in the nitric acid is obtained from sodium nitrate which comes from Chile, and the country is therefore dependent for its powder manufacture upon Chile. Some attempt has been made to place in storage a sufficient quantity of sodium nitrate to serve the country during a considerable period of interruption of supply; but there is no difficulty in saying now that the amount in store would produce a quantity of powder which would be insignificant in comparison with the requirements of a war, although it would undoubtedly be serviceable in tiding the country over a period which might be sufficient for setting in operation other methods of securing nitrogen for nitric acid, which would have been prepared in advance. A suggestion for improving the situation would be the accumulation of a larger store, but the experience of the expenditure of powder in the European war has shown that any estimate which could be demonstrated to be reasonable in the light of existing knowledge might be shown by an emergency, when it should arise, to be entirely inadequate. The military nations of Europe find themselves in this situation at the present time, and it would be hopeless to expect that the people of the United States could, even in the light of the lessons which the world is now receiving, be induced to consent to an investment in a store of this class of matériel which would provide for as great an increase over an estimate which could now be justified as the actual increase of the present European expenditure over the amount whose necessity was there foreseen before the war.
>
> These facts point to the necessity for inquiry into the possibility of the establishment within the limits of the country of a source of supply of this war essential. Fortunately the possibility exists. There are in successful operation in Europe, in several countries, plants for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen and rendering it available for use in the manufacture of nitric acid. These plants require for their manufacturing processes electric current in large amount. In order that they may be commercially successful the current must be very cheaply obtained, and it is generally thus cheaply obtained by the employment of water power. In this country the expense of the employment of steam-generated electric current would not, in my opinion, be such as to render this method prohibitive for such an amount as would be required for the manufacture of nitric acid for gunpowder and other military explosives.
> I believe that a steam plant could be established which would contribute effectively to the supply of the nitric acid which would be needed in the manufacture of powder for the current prosecution of a considerable war; but the expense, while not prohibitive, would still be such that this kind of a plant could probably not maintain itself commercially in ordinary times as against the production of nitric acid from imported nitrates, and the plant would, therefore, in all probability, remain in disuse in peace time, being held in reserve for time of war. Such a solution of the problem would be advisable if no better solution could be found; but the possibility of a better solution is apparent. There are in the United States various opportunities, under the control of the Federal Government, for the development of great water power. Some of these, I am informed, are such as to warrant their development for the purpose of power alone, and others would justify development for power in connection with or as an incident to the improvement of navigation. Estimates have been made of the cost of the power which could thus be made available, and have shown it to be such as to permit the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen in compounds which could be used in the manufacture of nitric acid at such prices as to enable water-power plants to maintain themselves in successful competition, in the nitrate industry, with foreign sources of supply of nitrates. In view of the right of control of the Federal Government of the sources of water power, it ought to be possible to permit their development by private parties, under such conditions of consent that the Government would be assured of their utilization for military purposes, when needed, at a reasonable cost; and as the great bulk of the output of the plants would be for commercial purposes it would not appear that the Government should itself embark in this development and production. If it should not be found practicable to devise a form of grant upon condition which Congress should consider such as to justify the exercise of its powers in such manner as to afford inducement to private enterprises to take the subject up, I consider the matter of sufficient importance to justify the Government itself in the development of power sufficient for its own military purposes. As some of the processes of fixation of atmospheric nitrogen are such that the resulting product is not immediately and directly available for the manufacture of nitric acid, but forms in itself an article of sufficiently profitable commerce to justify the stoppage of the process at the point of its production, means should be provided in advance, in case of the establishment of such a plant, for a continuation of the process, within a reasonable time, to a point such as to meet the needs of the country in the manufacture of powder. Under such conditions the store of sodium nitrate should be sufficient to tide over the interval necessary for the transformation of the industry.

Mr. President, one of the chief services, indeed, one of the most important services rendered to mankind by chemistry during the nineteenth century, was to reveal the absolute dependence of animal and vegetable life on nitrogen, to define clearly the part played by this element in nature, and to increase the number of technical products containing nitrogen.

I have heretofore shown that the United States is now spending millions of dollars in Chile annually for the purchase of nitrogen in its various combinations. The fact that the United States, in common with other countries, and especially with some manufacturing countries, is so dependent upon this one source, and the additional fact that the deposits of Chilean nitrate or saltpeter are not inexhaustible, and are destined at an early date to be completely exhausted—in fact, the Government reports say they will be exhausted in 1923—constitute what is called our nitrogen problem and must be met, and, in my judgment, met immediately by practical remedies. We must prepare for the fixation of the nitrogen we use for our explosives and for soil fertilizers. The Members of Congress who could for a moment refuse to consider this important question would, in my judgment, be worse than defaulters. A supply of nitrogen is as necessary as a supply of food or water. We should not hesitate a moment to take proper and practical steps toward the erection of plants for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

The nitrogen problem of the day is almost unique in one respect—the material is abundant, in fact it is unlimited. The difficulty is to bring it into form available for the wants of mankind.

The atmosphere enveloping the globe consists chiefly of nitrogen, which constitutes 78 per cent of its volume and 75.5 per cent of its weight. It has been estimated that the column of air resting upon each square yard of the earth's surface contains 5.8 tons of nitrogen in the free elementary state. Recent investigations show that the rock forming the solid crust of the globe contains a measurable amount of combined nitrogen—about 350 grams per cubic meter. Assuming a thickness of 10 miles for the crust, this represents a weight of about 4.5 tons of nitrogen beneath each square yard of surface. The atmospheric nitrogen above 1 square mile of land, amounting to about 20,000,000 tons, is equivalent to what the world would require in the next 50 years at the present rate of consumption.

Of this enormous reserve, a minute fraction, about 0.000002, is in the active service of the vegetable and animal kingdoms. In the soil, in the form of nitrate, it is a chief factor of plant food. With the plants it passes into the bodies of animals, whence it returns to the soil. Through the action of bacteria a small portion reverts to the elementary form of atmospheric nitrogen. Through the action of other bacteria, with the aid of certain legumes, and by electric discharges in the air, a corresponding amount is constantly brought into a combined form and enters the cycle of changes. The amount of this "nomadic" nitrogen, as it has been aptly termed, is on an average about 20 grams for each square yard of land.

Our duty is plain. In these troublous times we in charge of the Nation's destiny, we who now hold the most sacred deposit ever confided to human hands, should not shirk nor shrink. If we perform these duties, glory will be our portion; if we fail, it will be to our shame. There is no remorse so deep, so poignant, so inveterate, as that which comes from the consciousness that we have failed at a supreme crisis to avail ourselves of an opportunity to perform a real and needful public service, and there is no happiness more sustaining, more enduring, or more unselfish than the consciousness that we have met in a worthy manner the responsibilities upon us.

> One self-approving hour whole years outweighs
> Of stupid stares and loud huzzas;
> And more true joy Marcellus exil'd feels
> Than Cæsar with a senate at his heels.

Fortune, success, and opportunity soar aloft on high and rapid wing. They must be seized as they pass by. It is a difficult task to overtake them once they have left us behind, or found us asleep or afraid.

All success, whether of a nation, a political party, or an individual comes only from exacting toil and diligent labor, coupled with the ability to recognize an opportunity, however vagrant and disguised it may present itself. The individual, the party, the State that succeeds is the posthaster, not the postponer.

Pass these two bills—the bill providing for the erection of an armor-plate factory and the bill providing for a Government plant for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, and we will have the sympathy and support of honest and reasonable people, because we shall be entitled to it.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to state, at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Arizona, that possibly we do not realize just the condition in reference to this essential chemical element, not only for agricultural purposes, but for the explosives which are essential to the conduct of modern warfare.

I made some inquiry as to the available supply of nitrogen in this country for commercial purposes, and I quoted to the Senate the difference between the price two years ago and the present price of potash to be about $40 in 1913 and $500 in 1915. I find that the Chilean nitrates have now risen from about $36 or $37 a ton to $85 or $90 a ton, and that in its crudest form; and as to the available supply for agricultural purposes it is practically unobtainable.

Those from the western part of the country do not realize that agriculture in the southeastern portion of the cotton belt—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, eastern Alabama, and all of Florida—is practically dependent upon a commercial form of fertilizer.

My State, South Carolina, holds the world's record for corn production. Mr. Drake, of Marlboro County, made the fabulous yield of 250 bushels on 1 acre of upland. He did it largely by the use of high-grade nitrogenous fertilizers, because corn, unlike cotton, can be made with the use of nitrogen alone, or ammoniated fertilizers, which means the same. Nitrogen is a condensed form of ammonia. There is practically the same chemical formula in the case of one as in the case of the other.

I state now that we are beginning a new year. We felt the effects of fertilizer shortage last year. Our cotton crop dropped from 16,000,000 bales to a little over 10,000,000 bales from 1913 to 1914. You will have another drop if some provision is not made by which this chemical can be put in the soil.

We very often take the last term of any problem to solve it; it is like treating a symptom, we do not strike the disease. The credit of this country is largely maintained by the $700,000,000 annually imported in exchange for American cotton. I will say nothing about the use of it universally. Nine hundred million people, according to statistics, use American-grown cotton; but the idea seems to prevail here that the Government should not enter into competition with private capital where private capital may develop a given industry. I think our experience with the armor-plate company, that has brought forth the introduction of the armor-plate bill, is more vitally true of what we may expect in nitrogen production. We might do without armor-plate factories being established by the Government, and pay the price of private concerns in furnishing us with these necessary materials in the defense of our country; but we have not yet found a substitute, either in modern munitions or in explosive power, for these nitrous substances, nor have we found a substitute for the same chemical in obtaining the food and clothing of the millions of Americans.

It is idle for us, clothed with the power that we have in a democracy, when the fundamental principle that underlies all preparedness, that underlies all of our prosperity, is the farm, to turn over to the tender mercies of a few fertilizer companies our farming population; who by the very nature of their work are incapable of organization in the larger and more powerful sense, and yet upon whose shoulders we stand and upon whose handiwork we are dependent. It is a crime to leave them to the exploitation of private corporations, who, before ever the crop comes into existence that feeds and clothes you and me, take from the farmer the percentage that the corporation demands.

At the proper time I shall submit some statistics to show that in the State of South Carolina 50 per cent of the value of her cotton and corn crops goes to pay for the fertilizers upon which those crops are dependent, while from the Blue Ridge Mountains, a little over 100 miles distant, tributaries to our navigable streams are pouring into the ocean with power sufficient to take from the air, under the strong hand of our Government, sufficient nitrogen to enable these weak ones—weak individually, but strong in their numbers and in the result of their labor—to feed and clothe this country.

I have introduced this bill for the purpose of having the Government take the natural resources of the country and turn them over to the natural manipulators of these resources, those upon whom we ultimately depend, in order to enrich their soil and lay the foundation for the Government's and the Nation's prosperity in the form of an abundant food and clothing supply, and then also to give a source of supply to those very ones who respond when the cry of battle comes, when there comes the need of an Army. The very ones who feed you in time of peace will be the ones to protect you in time of war.

I have no apologies to make for asking the Government to come in and appropriate $15,000,000 as a contribution to that vast army who, in season and out of season, every month in the year and every day in the month, are toiling in that battle which makes it possible for us to sit in the Senate Chamber of the United States and enjoy the comforts of clothing and food and all that contributes to the health and comfort of the individual.

I have introduced this bill because I believe the Senate of the United States will see to it that preparedness in its real sense, in the sense that should appeal to us all, shall begin at the foundation of things and put in the proper shape those upon whom in every crisis, in time of peace and in time of war, the welfare of this country depends—the laborers.

I thank the Senator from Montana for allowing me, in his time, to have this to say. When my bill shall have been reported, as I hope it will be in the near future, I shall submit to the Senate some statistics that I think some of us stand sorely in need of knowing, and I shall address myself more fully to this particular subject at that time.

WATER-POWER SITES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am very glad to have yielded to the Senator from South Carolina. I think his remarks are very pertinent and embody much wisdom and useful information. I hope to hear from him further on the subject at some future time.

I will resume my humble argument on the unfinished business of the Senate, House bill 408, in an attempt to explain the measure, and express my views of it. My remarks yesterday, I realize, were very much disconnected owing to many interrogatories and other interruptions, and extended remarks of others being interjected. I shall try to begin, though, where I left off if I can determine where that may be.

I will say that if I am not interrupted very much I think I can conclude the remarks I have to make without consuming a great deal of time. While I shall hold myself ready and willing to answer questions, I would rather not be interrupted any more than Senators feel is necessary, and would rather not have extended remarks interjected into the body of my remarks and in my time. I would prefer to be interrupted as little as Senators may think proper according to their ideas of the drift of the discussion. At the same time I hold myself ready to answer any questions which may be propounded to me.

I will begin by saying that there was considerable said yesterday about the right of the Federal Government to make withdrawals of public lands and about the wisdom of the policy and the extent to which it has been carried, especially in the State of Colorado. I admit that the State of Colorado appears to have been made an example of what the Federal Government can do in that respect, and that in the State of Colorado the policy appears to have been carried to a very great extreme, perhaps an unjustifiable extreme. I am not a defender of the extent to which that policy has been carried in the State of Colorado. I think doubtless it is unjust to the State of Colorado. Neither am I a defender of carrying that policy to that extreme anywhere. It may be easily abused, like any other right. But as far as the legal and constitutional right of the Government to make withdrawals of public lands is concerned, I think it is established beyond question. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I do not think the legal right or the constitutional right can be questioned. The moral right may be questioned as a matter of policy; but, as shedding some light upon the legal right, I will refer to some matters of history.

Prior to the adoption of the Articles of Confederation certain of the States, including Maryland and New Jersey, six in all, insisted that the western lands claimed by the remaining seven States of the Confederation ought to be handled for the general good of the entire Confederation and not retained and disposed of by the individual States alleging ownership thereof. The matter was formally laid before Congress by the State of Delaware February 23, 1779; by the State of Maryland May 21, 1779; and New York claiming 202,187 acres, was the first to respond, her delegates, on March 7, 1780, presenting an act proposing to relinquish the lands claimed by her in the West.

On receipt of this document the Congress of the Confederation adopted a resolution, providing—

> That the unappropriated lands which may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State * * * shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States; * * * that the lands shall be granted or settled at such times and under such regulations as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them.

Thereafter, and in compliance with the resolution, the following States made cessions of their territory in the West to the United States: New York, March 1, 1781; Virginia, March 1, 1784; Massachusetts, April 19, 1785; Connecticut, September 13, 1786, and May 30, 1800; South Carolina, August 9, 1787; North Carolina, February 25, 1790; Georgia, April 24, 1802.

The lands so ceded involved a total of 259,171,780 acres, extending as far south as the Gulf of Mexico, as far west as the Mississippi River, and as far north as the Great Lakes.

The enabling act passed preliminary to the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union (18 Stat., 474), like that of all of the western States admitted into the Union, provided that the admission should be upon certain conditions irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the State, among the said conditions being that the people inhabiting the proposed States agree—

> That they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said territory and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States.

Ever since the beginning of our Government the lands ceded by the original States to the General Government and those acquired by conquest, cession, or purchase have been disposed of by the Federal Government under general laws enacted by Congress designed to procure their settlement and development, laws as nearly as possible uniform and alike as to lands of similar character wherever situated in the public domain. Each of the Western States has been given a generous grant or donation, ranging from two to four sections per township, for educational purposes, with additional grants for the support of institutions of higher education, reformatories, penal institutions, and so forth. Any reservations made within public-land areas by the Federal Government have been designed for the public welfare or general good not only of the Nation at large but of the State within the limits of which the reservation was created.

I know it is claimed that because the enabling acts of the several public-land States provide that the public lands within the boundaries of those States are retained for "disposition" by the United States and because the words "dispose of" are therein used such lands must be, as soon as may be feasible and expedient, alienated—transferred to State or individual ownership.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has settled that and has held several times that it is within the jurisdiction and province of Congress to lease public land; that the words "dispose of" in that connection do not mean absolutely and necessarily a sale of the land.

I think that the system of the withdrawal of public lands within the boundaries of the States within judicious and discreet limits may be productive of good. Of course the right may be abused, as any other right may be; but I do not believe that the utilization of such land as may be discreetly and properly withdrawn for power-site purposes, if really adapted to power-site uses, is an abuse of the right or will result in any harm to the States in which the withdrawals are made. On the other hand, I believe it may result in good and that it will result in increased taxation to the State.

As I was saying yesterday when I discontinued my remarks, the Government owns the land adjacent to the waters in the public-land States where you find streams running through public lands. The Federal Government owns the land and the State owns the water, and I insist that this bill in no manner attempts to take the water away from the State. In such cases both the land and the water are absolutely essential to the generation of hydroelectric power. The land without the water will not produce hydroelectric power; neither will the water without the land; and as the Federal Government owns the land and the State owns the water, I see no possible way out of the present stagnation of water-power development other than that the Federal Government and the State government, acting jointly in cooperation, each contributing its share of assets and resources, shall work together for the common good of the people, who are citizens of both State and Nation.

The highest object of government, both in a Federal and State sense, is the promotion of the common welfare of the people. What higher motive can there be? Here is an opportunity for the Federal and State Governments combined to act very happily in the promotion of the common welfare and the production of general prosperity. I think we will be culpable if we do not invoke that power and enact some adequate and feasible legislation for the development of water power in the public-land States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In the States where the State owns the water and the Government owns the land through which the water runs, how does the Senator contend that the Government has a right to take or regulate that which is the exclusive property of the State except with the consent of the State?

Mr. MYERS. I do not claim that at all. The Government merely fixes the compensation for the use of the land.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But it gives the permit to use the water.

Mr. MYERS. No; not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the bill provide for that?

Mr. MYERS. It provides that that shall be done under the laws of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Therefore, unless the State consents, there can be no permit granted?

Mr. MYERS. Unless projectors first make an appropriation of water under the laws of and by virtue of the authority of the State in which the project is to be located, they can not get any permit under the Federal Government to the use of the land.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will permit me, it is a lease, as I understand it, for 50 years.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; a lease of the land.

Mr. SHAFROTH. A lease of the land. And it is proposed in such a situation that it shall hold up enterprise as soon as the Government does lease it. In other words, a company can not operate or locate or claim or take possession of or condemn or anything of that kind; but this blocks an enterprise unless the parties make terms with the Government in regard to the lease.

Mr. MYERS. That is true as to that which the Federal Government owns. It owns the land. The Federal Government is the proprietor of the land, and I think it ought to make some charge for the use of it. Unless a man will pay some compensation for the use of the land he can not get a lease of it under the terms of the bill; and I do not think it ought to be otherwise.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator think that the State or the individual has a right to condemn the land?

Mr. MYERS. We discussed that at some length yesterday. I stated yesterday—and a number of Senators agreed with me—that some authorities hold that a State or individual may condemn public land for a public use; but it has never been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a mooted question, and probably always will be until it gets to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator's colleague [Mr. THOMAS] indicated very strongly yesterday that he thought the Supreme Court of the United States would uphold that right, and in his remarks cited some authority justifying his opinion.

It is no secret that we have stopped building hydroelectric plants in the United States. There is not to-day a single such plant of appreciable size under construction anywhere in the country. A number of large enterprises have been planned, and still others are under consideration, waiting for Congress to enact laws which will make financing and construction possible. Hundreds of engineers and thousands of skilled and unskilled workmen, dependent upon such work, are out of employment awaiting the enactment of this kind of legislation. Manufacturers of water-power machinery, materials, and supplies, with millions of dollars invested in their plants, are without orders, and asking Congress to pass such laws as will restore their business.

The country is in a deadlock over legislation for the development of water power. There is one class of people who claim that the land embraced in the withdrawn power sites should be turned over to the States and that the several States should be allowed to go ahead, each one of the 48 States independently and for itself, with full control over legislation for the development of water power within its borders. I can not and do not subscribe to that doctrine. I think it would be dangerous, unfeasible, unworkable, impractical. I do not believe that the people of the United States who, as a whole, own these valuable power-site privileges and advantages should surrender their heritage to the various States. They should retain them and utilize them for the common good and hold them for future generations.

There is another class of people who claim that the Federal Government should take charge of everything. Now, as long as those two extremes stand deadlocked with each other there is going to be no water-power development; there will be no legislation; there will be a continuation of the depressing stagnation which we have experienced for the last 10 or 15 years. I say that we should come to some compromise of that deadlocked situation. We must give and take some in our views, if we are to have any legislation that will revive the development of water power in this country, and that is what this bill undertakes to do.

The bill recognizes the rights of the States over the water flowing within their boundaries, and the right of the Federal Government as proprietor—under decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—of the public land adjacent to those streams. The bill gives to each, the Federal and the State government, its proper function and sphere of activity in this field of development. It is a compromise; and if we are to have any legislation whatever on the subject, there must be some compromise, or there will be a continuation for an indefinite number of years of the stagnation which now prevails.

I say that we should by all means compromise conflicting views and have some legislation on the subject which will contribute to the wealth, prosperity, development, and welfare of the country. It is not a question of what we can get. Some of my fellow Senators seem to hold to the attitude of refusing to take anything unless they can get exactly what they want. It is not a question of getting exactly what we want that will ever start the wheels of development in this long-neglected field of activity. We must take what we can get, if it presents any fair solution of the matter at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe that when an enterprise is to be undertaken, if there are private lands along the way, the parties have the authority to begin condemnation proceedings and to condemn that private land, and that we should, under this bill, have the right, whenever Government lands are along there, also to have the right to condemn those lands?

Mr. MYERS. That I thought we all expressed our views about yesterday, and I had to admit that there was some uncertainty about the question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This proposed law does not provide for it or authorize it. I have no doubt that it would be perfectly constitutional and legal to provide in the bill that any person or company undertaking the erection of a power plant shall have a right to condemn the land, not only of the private individual, but any land, whether owned by the Government or not, upon paying due compensation therefor—that is, the value of the land for all the uses it may be put to.

Mr. MYERS. I am not a believer in that theory. The Federal Government is the proprietor of the public land withdrawn for power-site purposes, and I believe it should retain jurisdiction of it and have some hand in the development of the resources. This business—the generation of hydroelectric power—must necessarily result, in a large measure, in interstate-commerce transactions, in the transmission of electric power from one State to another, and I believe, on account of that, the Federal Government should retain some jurisdiction, so that within its proper sphere it will have something to say about it. I am not a believer in turning over all these water-power sites to the States, to let 48 States enact each one different laws to suit itself and regulate affairs according to its own ideas, and have a thousand conflicts in a business which must necessarily in its nature be more or less an interstate-commerce matter. I believe the bill pursues the right course in that regard. It provides that in interstate business there shall be Federal control and in intrastate business there may be State control, subject to Federal proprietorship of the land. That is right. It is the ideal arrangement. It is analogous to our control of railroads—Federal control of interstate traffic, State control of intrastate traffic.

I spoke briefly yesterday on the wonderful benefits that will result from this class of legislation if we are successful in getting it through Congress. There are a great many uses to which electrical power was a stranger a few years ago that are now common. It is found that there are many uses in everyday life for that cheap class of power, and there will be many more in a few years. The development of water power in the Western States would result in many different ways in increased prosperity for the people, for the communities, and for the States themselves as Commonwealths. A few of the uses to which electrical power has been in recent years put successfully and will be put more successfully in the next few years are the following:

Cheap electricity for fuel and power, light and heat, in the cities and on the farms.

Reclamation by irrigation of vast areas of land now idle and useless.

Establishment of new industries, around which will grow new towns and cities, creating employment for hundreds of thousands of people and new markets for agricultural products.

New steel and iron industries in new sections.

Cheapened production of metals from low-grade ores.

Cheaper agricultural fertilizers and consequent larger agricultural crops.

The establishment in this country of electrochemical industries for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, now unknown in the United States, but which may be expected to grow to astonishing dimensions with the development of cheap water power, alone makes possible a long line of new manufacturing and mining operations, which promises an era of prosperity and activity greater than any the country has probably ever known.

One of the principal benefits which will arise in the West from this legislation is in the irrigation of arid lands which are not now susceptible to irrigation by the gravity system. Millions of acres of public lands in the arid-land States, hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of acres in my own State, not now cultivated, practically waste lands, productive of no good to anybody, may be converted into fruitful farms of great productivity if we may have legislation to produce cheap water power.

It is estimated that there are at least 10,000,000 acres of arid lands located in the far Western States, lying above the reach of gravity water that can only be reclaimed through water raised by pumps, operated by the cheap hydroelectric power now latent and wasting in the various streams from which the water would be pumped. Thus the land, and at a lower level the water to irrigate it, and the power to raise the water to the land are often all assembled at one point.

Given water these lands will produce every fruit, vegetable, and grain that is native to the temperate zone, and are capable of supporting a population of 2,000,000 people.

If capital can be interested, it is safe to say that hundreds of thousands of water horsepower will be utilized within the next 10 years after the enactment into law of this measure, in connection with the reclamation of arid lands, and that in addition to what the Government service will accomplish, hundreds of millions of dollars of private capital will be used for the establishment of reclamation projects in connection with pumping plants.

With a bill of this kind enacted into law and in successful operation, as I believe would result, there would be scarcely an excuse for a single quarter section of arid land in the Western States remaining arid and unproductive. The result would be that the agricultural output of our country would be largely increased and the cost of living to the masses of the people cheapened. I verily believe that it would be a happy method of securing what statesmen, economists, and theorists have long sought to find, a method of reducing the present high cost of living which has prevailed in this country and all over the world for years past.

Two splendid arguments as to the result of legislation of this character in benefiting the people have been heard in the addresses this afternoon in the Senate of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Two of the principal results flowing from this legislation would be the production of fertilizers and the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. The production of fertilizers would be of enormous benefit to the farmers of this country. Their land is rapidly being depleted and exhausted. It is diminishing each year in productive capacity, and some means must be found of restoring its virgin fertility or this country will be unable in time to compete with some other sections of the world in the production of agricultural resources. Here is the opportunity for the farmers of the United States to have put in their hands the greatest possible agency of restoring the fertility of their lands, increasing their crops, and making this country the storehouse of the world for agricultural products.

At the same time legislation of this character will enable both the Government and individuals to engage in the business of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. It will not ony aid in the production of fertilizers, but it may be utilized by the Government in the manufacture of munitions of war. As has been said by those Senators, this country is dependent almost entirely now upon the Chilean beds of nitrate for their nitrate products, and if by war or for any other unforeseen cause which might intervene we should be cut off from that source of supply the people of this country would have no way of obtaining nitrate, either for fertilizer or for the manufacture of munitions of war.

So this measure is really not only a development measure and a conservation measure, in the true sense of those words, but it is a part of the preparedness measures which should be put through Congress with a view to putting this country in a proper state of preparedness to defend itself from the encroachments of foreign nations, in the event we should have foreign troubles. With legislation of this character, the country would be enabled at any time to manufacture all the explosives which go into the makeup of munitions of war, and it would make the country absolutely independent in a highly essential feature of national existence in which it is now not by any means independent.

I know that one great objection to this measure is the leasing feature of it. I shall not say much about that, because there are irreconcilable differences existing in the Senate over that question, and each school of thought is going to keep its opinion in that regard.

I am not in favor of any general leasing system of our public domain. I would not for an instant approve of leasing agricultural land which is capable of being homesteaded and of making homes and farms for our citizens. I would not approve of leasing grazing lands. I do not believe in carrying the leasing system to that extent.

The object of the homestead law is to make homes for the people, and that is the true and correct disposition of the public domain which is capable of adaptation to agricultural purposes. But this bill merely provides for leasing little strips of land along the banks of flowing streams. A man can not make a home on a dam site; he can not make a living there. If these sites were susceptible of being made into homes for the people, if we were taking homes away from the homeless by these withdrawals and by this very inconsequential system of leasing, I would not favor it; but it does not interfere in the least with the true spirit and intent of the Government in devoting the great body of our public domain to homes for the people. It does not interfere with that a particle.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that in that clause of the Constitution which provides that Congress shall have power to control and regulate the territory and make rules and regulations concerning it until disposed of it was meant by the Constitution to be the determination of the Government to absolutely part with the title and not lease the land?

Mr. MYERS. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that Congress has power to lease public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it so held in a case where the leases were 5 years in extent. It has said that 5 years was a very limited time in the life of a nation, and I expect they would hold perhaps to 50 years so far as saying that the act is constitutional. It is all expressed in the decision that the object is to hold only the land until disposed of in good faith. Outside of the constitutional question imposed upon the Government, it seems to me it is to dispose of the land so that the States can live by taxation upon the land. It seems to me that the words "disposed of" have an important bearing. It can be avoided by saying 50 years or 25 years or 5 years, and it may come within the strict letter of the Constitution, but it seems to me everyone must recognize that leasing land is not disposing of it. Investment in land is the most conservative and perfect way for a permanent investment that can be conceived of, and leasing is not disposing of the land. It is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, it seems to me, not to the extent of saying that it would be unconstitutional but from the fact that it was the intention of Congress and the intention of the Constitution makers that the Government should not permanently and forever hold lands within Territories, because it severs the relation, as it were, between the States and the Nation. Now, I ask the Senator, does he not think that that clause in the Constitution "until disposed of" meant by the Constitution makers at that time that the United States Government should not lease but should dispose of land?

Mr. MYERS. No; because the Supreme Court of the United States has said differently. I recognize that as good authority and accept it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe that if by this bill we would say that we propose forever to hold these lands and never part with them it would be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court?

Mr. MYERS. It might; but this bill does not provide anything of that kind.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Supreme Court might say that 50 years is a limited period——

Mr. MYERS. I think it would.

Mr. SHAFROTH. A limited period in the life of a nation, and therefore we will not say it is unconstitutional, but we will leave that to Congress, but in spirit it violates the Constitution. I believe when this system is fastened upon us it is going to remain forever, although it is not expressed in the bill that way. Consequently, if it does mean forever, it then follows, it seems to me, that it is not a constitutional provision.

Mr. MYERS. The principle is the same. If the Government can lease for 5 years, it can lease for 50 years. I believe the Federal Government should get something out of these valuable water-power sites for the benefit of the people of the country, who own them. I am not a believer in giving them away nor of parting with them for nothing. The enabling acts of all the Western States say that the people of the States disclaim forever all right in and control over these lands, at least without the consent of the United States Government, and the people of the whole country own these public lands. The people of the States have solemnly renounced all right, title, and interest in them and all claim to them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is right; but would not the Government get something out of them if they were to require the States or any person attempting to obtain them to pay what was the fair value as fixed in a condemnation suit? If you can attach to that any specific purpose, or all purposes whatever, the value of the land, it seems to me, would give compensation to the Government. I wish to call attention to this fact: We have acquired all this public domain and it has cost us just $4\frac{7}{10}$ cents per acre. Is it possible that the United States Government ought to try to take millions out of what cost $4\frac{7}{10}$ cents per acre? We condemn that in the case of a private individual. Should we not condemn it in the case of the Government holding up enterprises by reason of doing that?

Mr. MYERS. No; these lands belong to all the people of the whole country, and the Federal Government ought to try to get something like what they are reasonably worth for the benefit of the entire people. I believe we would come nearer to doing that by lease than by sale. If we sold them they might be sold for a song and future generations would get no benefit whatever from them. The better way is to keep them. They will become more valuable with the passing of time, and our children should have some benefit from them. They should be considered and kept in mind.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if that is the position the Senator takes, why does he not go further than the bill for the leasing of oil and gas lands and apply the leasing system to gold and silver and copper and all the precious metals? The Government of the United States no doubt could secure more than $5 an acre for such land. If it is a question of the Government of the United States making every dollar possible out of the lands of the United States, why not make it universal and have it apply to everything? I think if that was done the West would be completely paralyzed.

Mr. MYERS. I will give a few of my reasons for differentiating. Water power is something which concerns all the people of the country. The whole community, everybody, uses it in the shape of electric power nowadays; and they are all interested, they are all concerned. Hydroelectric energy is produced from a power site. Everybody in the community is interested in that, everybody in the community uses it, and everybody in the community is entitled to get it at a fair and reasonable rate of compensation. But if you take gold out of a gold mine everybody in the community is not interested in that. It is not everybody who has a voice in the disposition of it. Everybody does not have to have it. The man who prospects and discovers a gold mine or any other mine of precious metals and develops it and puts his capital into it is entitled to all the profit there is in it, because it does not concern the public at large. Water power does. It is a public utility.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly would have to take issue with the Senator there. When power is developed it only concerns the people to whom that power can be carried profitably. Up to date it can be carried over a wire perhaps four or five hundred miles. But take gold from the mine, it goes into circulation; it is the life blood of commerce; it is felt in every part of the country. The Senator well knows that in 1849 when gold was discovered in California it was virtually the thing that saved this country from the worst sort of a panic. There is not a person in the United States, business man or workingman, who is not benefited directly or indirectly by every dollar that is taken from the ground and put into circulation.

Mr. MYERS. They are entitled to it when they can get it, when they do something to earn it, but in the case of hydroelectric energy, whether everyone does something or not, the community is benefited just the same by its development. It has reached the point now where practically everybody in the community uses it, and they are all interested in it, and have a right to be served at a reasonable rate of compensation. Precious metals are not of common and general use like hydroelectric energy. Let the man who discovers and develops a gold mine have the gold he gets out of it. He earns it. It is his. I have no interest in it, no right to it. He may do what he may please with it. He may hoard it if it pleases him to do so. But the man who develops electrical power has no right to do with it what he may please. I am interested in it. I need it and have a right to be served with it at a reasonable price. That is the difference.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not going to lessen the price of electric current to the consumer by charging a royalty upon all the power that is produced, because whatever royalty is placed upon the producing of electric power and the royalty paid to the Government, it has to be collected from the ultimate consumer.

Mr. MYERS. We really ought to have something for administrative purposes under a law of this kind; but whatever is collected is to go entirely and absolutely to the State; the Federal Government is to get nothing out of it. There is not even anything reserved in this bill for administrative purposes, as there might well be.

Another feature of modern use to which electrical power is being very successfully put and which will result in great and untold benefit to the people of the West and the amazing development of their resources is the electrification of railroads.

Resuming my discussion of the beneficial uses of electrical power, United States railroads are commencing to electrify parts of their systems, and a number of roads are now using electricity. The possibilities of future and more general electrification is merely a matter of making the economy of cheaply generated electricity overcome the heavy expense necessary to be expended in power plants, transmission lines, and reconstruction of the roads for electrical traction.

The most extensive main-line railway electrification in the United States, or in the world, thus far is that of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, which has electrified upward of 500 miles of track leading into New York City and is operating more than 100 electric locomotives and a slightly lesser number of multiple-unit cars. This road's electrification includes its Harlem division freight yards, which are among the largest in the world, and its motor equipment includes high-speed engines for passenger service, heavy engines for freight and express service, and slow engines for switching service. The power for this electrical service is generated from a steam plant at Stamford, Conn., and it is said that the cost of operation, including interest on the expensive equipment, is more costly than would be the cost of operation with steam locomotives.

Until a few years ago it was thought that electrification of railroads would be carried out by one of two systems—the 600 to 700 volt direct-current third-rail or the high-tension, single-phase alternating-current overhead system. These earlier difficulties, as to nature of current, contact device, and so forth, have, however, been fully overcome, and the Pennsylvania Railroad uses 11,000-volt single-phase current in the electrified zone in and about the Philadelphia terminals, while for heavy, mountain-grade work the Norfolk & Western uses three-phase alternating-current induction motors on their locomotives, but take the power from an overhead 11,000-volt single-phase line.

The Norfolk & Western hauls heavy trains over its mountain grades with 6,000-horsepower locomotives, which are motors when climbing grades and which become dynamos on the down grade, generating power from the motion of the descending train and returning to the overhead line a considerable portion of the current used in climbing the hill.

I want, while I am on that subject, to refer briefly to what electrical power has done for Montana. I believe the enactment of this bill into law would, in the next few years, mean the investment of many millions of dollars in the State of Montana. The generation of electrical power has already done a great deal for that State. It has given it a tremendous advance in industrial lines, and has brought very much prosperity to the State; but all the power which has been developed there so far has been on privately owned land. If this bill were passed and enacted into law, it would open up a much wider and more feasible field of generation of electric power, which is now closed entirely to capital. There are in the State of Montana withdrawals of some splendid power sites, which, if open to investment under fair and adequate legislation, would be utilized, and, I believe, would more than double the amount of electrical power generated in Montana and more than double the prosperity and the development which has been brought along that line to the State of Montana.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana recognizes, does he not, that before the passage of the act of 1901, and really until withdrawals were made about 1907, the great development took place in electricity, in power plants, which was referred to by the colleague of the Senator some days ago. That development was proceeding very rapidly. The conservationists came in with the proposition that they wanted genuine development, but pleading that it was being hampered by the filings that were made in the Interior Department, and, in order to get rid of those filings, they wanted the permits revocable. You can readily see that they no doubt thought that they were going to provide a means of great activity, but instead of that it was an absolute stoppage.

The question in this bill is whether it does not contain restrictions which will hamper development, instead of making development. If you resort to a system that has proven a success, why is it not better; why is it not wiser?

Mr. MYERS. Practical water-power men and water-power investors tell me that the provisions of this bill will not hamper investment and development.

Furthermore, would the Senator from Colorado absolutely repeal the revocable permit law of 1901 and not enact any law in its place? Would he be satisfied to leave things in that condition?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly, because each State has a public-utility commission, which requires that the power shall be furnished at cheap rates to the people; and with that power over these companies there will be no such thing as imposition upon the people in connection with the rates charged.

Mr. MYERS. How would the Senator get possession of or title to the land which enters into power sites if the law of 1901 were repealed?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would file on them just exactly as we filed on them before.

Mr. MYERS. As homestead entries?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; not as homestead entries. They have a law there which provides a definite method of location. One makes application for a power site just as in the case of irrigation. In that case it is necessary to file with the State engineer, as is also true in the case of power sites, an exact plat showing the exact number of reservoirs, where they are located, the contour of the reservoirs, and, if it is in a stream, the kind of dam that is going to be erected. After that is filed in the State engineer's office it is checked up, and then, when it is approved, it is sent here to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval or disapproval. If it is approved, as it ought to be, as was customary up to 1901, or, in fact, up to 1907, the construction is proceeded with, subject to regulation by the utilities commission of the State. I want to say that the rates are very low in my State, not perhaps for power furnished by franchise companies in the cities, but by development companies. I know of one company that furnishes electricity at a rate of one-half cent per kilowatt hour, and I noticed in the hearings here the other day the case of a California company concerning which the commission made a ruling—and they have adhered to it ever since—requiring them to furnish electricity at the rate of 6⅞ mills per kilowatt hour. When you consider that here in the city of Washington we pay 8, 9, and 10 cents per kilowatt hour, it will be seen that the former is a very low rate indeed.

Mr. MYERS. I know that it was not many years prior to 1901 that power sites could be homesteaded or secured with scrip or any other form of entry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That ought not to be permitted. I perfectly agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. MYERS. And the Federal Government would get nothing out of them. But, so far as the method of filing plats and getting permits and approvals from the Interior Department is concerned, I do not think that any Senator on this floor has complained more of the arbitrary exercise of bureaucratic power than has the Senator from Colorado. This bill is designed to get away from that abuse and to enact a plain law by Congress, so that everybody will know what he can do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am perfectly free to say that I think this bill will make a bureaucracy as to this matter just as there has been in other lines in the various departments.

Mr. MYERS. I regret to say that the Senator from Colorado can see nothing in the Federal Government but bureaucracy. Every time you raise the United States flag he has stage fright because of the specter of bureaucracy.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not; but the administration of the public lands has been by bureaus in Washington, and they have treated us very unfairly.

Now, I want to ask the Senator a question, which, it seems to me, is in line with what he is saying. The Senator knows that if you are going to construct a railroad which is to go over public land, you must file in the Interior Department a definite plat of location of the railroad. Do you think the Government ought to say, "No; we will not let the railroad be constructed unless you give us a part of the net earnings of the company each year?" Would not that hamper railroad building? Would it not have a tendency to prevent railroad companies from proceeding with railroad construction? Would they not say they did not want to be hampered by regulations, and would it not be almost absolutely destructive if we should say, "We are going to charge you for every ton that goes over your railroad, because you go over our land"?

Mr. MYERS. But a railroad is a common carrier, and for that reason also has the right of eminent domain under the English common law and under the law of this country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So is a company for the distribution of electric power a common carrier. It has been so decided in our country; and it seems to me that the more restrictions you put around it the less development you will have and the higher the rates the companies will charge the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the State of Montana there is a power company to-day developing a great amount of electrical power.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that they have sold power at $20 per horsepower per year for the purpose of operating a certain railroad.

Mr. MYERS. I think that is correct. I have the figures here.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been accomplished without the passage of any such law as is contemplated by this bill.

Mr. MYERS. They generate all their power on privately owned land. Would you not have anybody come in competition with them?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, that is not what I had in mind. I want to say to the Senator that if the conditions existed as they existed before the passage of the act of 1891 one could secure title to the lands and develop electric power. If a private concern upon private land has developed power in the State of Montana and sold it at $20 per horsepower for the operating of a railroad, what reason has the Senator to fear that that could not be done in other States if the title to the land could be secured? What reason has the Senator to fear, if the water power to be developed within his own State is developed in the same way, that any greater amount would be charged the people than is now charged?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WALSH. If my colleague will yield to me, I will ask the Senator from Utah a question in that connection.

Mr. MYERS. I have yielded.

Mr. SMOOT. As soon as the Senator answers my question, then I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. MYERS. I am very glad to answer it. Although the rate cited by the Senator from Utah is a cheap rate for power, I do not see how any harm could result from throwing open to the public under feasible legislation other splendid power sites which are not now available, enabling new investors and new companies to compete with those which are already in the field.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that if the new investor and the new company are hampered by regulations and by a charge upon every horsepower developed, they will not stand upon the same basis as the company which is already established and is producing electrical power upon lands over which there is no governmental control or charge imposed per horsepower.

Mr. MYERS. They will know that when they go into the business, and, if they make arrangements to compete under those conditions, the assumption is that they will be able to compete, or they would not invest their money and go into the business.

Mr. SMOOT. The very thing I am afraid of is that they may not be able to compete.

Mr. WALSH. If my colleague will yield——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to advise the Senator from Utah that the power sites now being developed in Montana have long since passed into private ownership by virtue of homestead entries, through the location of Sioux half-breed scrip, soldiers' additional homestead scrip, Valentine scrip, forest reserve scrip, fake mining claims, and other entries of that character. Does the Senator mean that he would like to have that system continued?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the Senator from Utah has not intimated any such thing; and even if what the Senator from Montana states were universally true—and perhaps there are some such cases as those described by him; I have no doubt that there are—but even if all locations were of the character which the Senator has described, the Senator will admit that the price of electricity in the State of Montana now is exceptionally low?

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator about that; but that is not the question. The Senator from Utah addressed to my colleague the question whether these power sites could not be put to a public use in exactly the same way that the power sites were prior to the passage of the act of 1901. I want to know from the Senator from Utah if he would like to have power sites now appropriated under these other acts?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I never did approve and never will approve of any evasive way of securing public lands of any character for any purpose. I am well aware that there were evils in obtaining title to public lands not only for power sites but for timber and stone as well.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not mean to say that they were fraudulently procured at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I say there were such cases.

Mr. WALSH. I mean to say that they were secured under those acts, there being no law whatever for the disposition of the land as power sites.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will go further than the Senator, and say that title was fraudulently obtained in very many cases. I know of great tracts of timberlands in this country which have been secured under the law governing placer-mining claims. I know that there are many acres of land of different character which have been obtained fraudulently; but we are not considering that question now. No one approves of any such acts to-day.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. It is far from me to say that the Senator from Utah approves of them; but let us dismiss the other consideration entirely and go back prior to 1901, when these properties, these valuable power sites, were appropriated as homesteads. They were appropriated under the timber and stone act, they were appropriated under the various scrip acts. Now, when the Senator asks, Can not these power sites on public lands be disposed of in exactly the same way that they were before? I want to know from the Senator if that is really his attitude.

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, I want them disposed of under some proper system. As the Senator knows, one seeking a location would have to file with the State engineer, I think in every State, an application for water.

The Senator knows that the applicant would have to get consent from the State before the power site could be used for the development of power. He knows that the Secretary of the Interior would have to approve of the application, and that up to 1891 those who secured title other than by the use of scrip, which the law allowed, obtained it in this way; and it seems to me that is the proper way to do now, or, so far as I am concerned, I would be more than willing to grant the State the right to make application for every water-power site within the State, just as the substitute for this bill which I have offered provides, and make the State responsible—give the State the power to say when an electric-power plant shall be established and give the State control of the rates which may be charged by the company.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks that Congress would pass a law turning these power sites over to the States?

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that ultimately that will be done. I do not know whether or not public sentiment is such to-day that Congress would do it.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator whether he thinks that the relatively low-valued agricultural lands could be turned over to the States?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senate of the United States would turn the remainder of the public lands over to the States.

Mr. WALSH. I am speaking now of Congress, not of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. And I will say to the Senator that I think the same sentiment is growing in the House.

Mr. WALSH. I apprehend that the Senator speaks frankly about this matter, as he usually does. Will he agree that it is impossible to get public sentiment to approve of turning over to the States even the relatively low-valued agricultural and grazing lands?

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that is true.

Mr. WALSH. Now, does the Senator think that under those circumstances it would be possible to get them to turn over to the States these immensely valuable lands which exist in only small quantities?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they are not valuable except as they are made valuable by the investment of money under the laws of the State and the use of the water of the State. That is what makes them valuable. Otherwise they are only rocky mountain sides. They never can be used by any citizen of the United States for any other purpose than for the development of water power, and I believe that the Congress of the United States, if they understood the situation and knew that the States would control the rates at which the power should be furnished to the ultimate consumer and that there was no chance of a monopoly or of an injustice being inflicted on citizens of the United States, would pass a law giving them the right to secure title to such lands.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Utah if he would have the law of 1901 absolutely repealed and make no provision whatever by legislative enactment for the development of water power in the Western States?

Mr. SMOOT. I would greatly prefer that, Mr. President, to having the law of 1901, as construed by the department, stand on the statute books to-day. I am as positive as I am that I stand here that if it were repealed there would be a more rapid development of water power in the West than there will be under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator how would anyone get title to the land?

Mr. SMOOT. Just wait until I answer the question of the senior Senator from Montana. I want to say, Mr. President, that in a system of development, with the States having absolute control and the public-utilities commissions regulating the price of the power, no citizen in the United States would ever suffer from such control. I know it has been said that in the past franchises have been given to railroads without consideration or compensation, and that valuable franchises have been given to street railways in the cities. That is true; but that day has passed. You can not find a city in the United States which to-day would grant to a street railway a franchise for 99 years with no consideration whatever. You can not find a State that would give to a railroad company a franchise for 50 or for 99 years without requiring some return to the State. Public sentiment has changed; the ideals of the American people have changed. In saying that, I do not want to be understood as criticizing the Western States, for at the time such franchises were granted in those Commonwealths the people there had but one idea, and that was to build up their cities and to develop their States. So they invited people to come, for they had resources which were undeveloped which needed capital, and without the development of which those communities could not grow. The people who were there were poor; they were pioneers; they went there to develop the country, and in order to develop it they offered inducements to others to come there and to invest their money. So I have no apprehension, Mr. President, as to a State to-day frittering away or giving away any valuable franchise to any corporation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator having referred to the possibility of regulation, I want to ask him is there in the State of Utah a regulatory tribunal which controls the price of electrical power?

Mr. SMOOT. I have answered the Senator that question once before, but I am glad to answer it again. Up to the present time there is no public-utilities commission in the State of Utah, and I have stated why; but I have no doubt that the next legislature will enact such a law. I have no doubt that such a commission will be provided for.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator whether the governor of his State did not veto a bill of that character which was passed at the last session of the legislature?

Mr. SMOOT. The governor vetoed a bill because of the form of the bill, but not because of the principle involved. I desire to say to the Senator that both parties in Utah have in their platforms declared in favor of the creation of a public-utilities commission; but the form of the bill passed did not satisfy the governor and he vetoed it. The Senator from Montana, however, need not worry one moment about the creation of a public-utilities commission in the State of Utah. A law creating such a commission is going to be passed. There is no question in my mind as to that.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will claim the floor again. Fifteen years ago the development of the electrical power of this country was in its infancy, and laws on the subject were very crude. If the Senator from Utah would be willing to go back to those laws and those conditions, then, truly, there is nothing progressive about him, and he is not at all in touch with the progress and the advancement of the times. I believe a different spirit prevails in this country to-day and that more is demanded than in the past.

I was on the subject of what the generation of electrical power has done for the State of Montana, as an example of what it might do for all of the Western States under favorable circumstances. I will recur to that subject and give a few more facts.

The mines of Butte, Mont., the greatest copper mines in the United States, were formerly operated by steam, at an average cost of $85 per horsepower per year, and were using 35,000 horsepower, ranging in price from $66 to $130 per horsepower. The Montana Power Co., generators of electrical power, now furnish power from a distance of 130 miles, and have taken over all the business of operating those mines for the life of the mines at $30 per horsepower per year, which is a great saving to those industries.

The mine owners can now carry on operations for $2,000,000 per year less than before. They mine in that camp 4,000,000 tons of ore per year, and the reduced price of power makes each ton worth 50 cents more than before. The mine owners can now take out ore worth 50 cents per ton less than before, enabling the mining companies to extract, at equal profit, ore running very much less per ton.

The Montana Power Co. has recently made a contract with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. to furnish operating power for 450 miles of its road in Montana and Idaho, 230 miles of which are now in operation. The contract is for 99 years at $21 per horsepower per year, and will cost the railroad $550,000 per year. That is what it is costing the road now to operate that part of its line. Before that it had cost the road $1,750,000 per year for operating the same number of miles.

The Butte, Anaconda & Pacific Railway, a Montana road, 80 miles long, is all electrified. Before electrification it was paying $22,500 a month for coal alone, and hauling it over its own line. The total cost of power now is $8,000 a month—a saving of $14,500 a month, or $174,000 a year.

Those are a few of the things that the development of electrical power has done for Montana. It will do far more for my State if you will give it a chance. It will do as much for some other States.

If this bill becomes a law, I look for the time to come in the near future when all three of the great transcontinental railroads traversing the State of Montana will be operated solely by electrical power, and I think the time will come when they will be operated by electrical power altogether from Chicago to the Pacific coast. I look for all of the transcontinental railroads crossing the country, all of the railroads in the Western States where electrical power may be obtained cheaply and readily, to be operated in a few years by electrical power, and at an enormous saving of cost, because there is where cheap power may be generated. There are numerous opportunities for the generation of it, numerous fine sites, and it will result in a great saving in the operation of all of the railroads of that section of the country, the West. The people who patronize those roads, the passengers who travel on them, the shippers who ship freight on them, ought to get the benefit of that saving, and I believe will get it, under our system of regulating railroad charges by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of interstate business, and by the State commissions in the case of intrastate business.

The mines of all that region may be operated more cheaply and economically, as is the case to-day in copper mines at Butte, in Montana. Factories will spring up in those States. Industries now unknown to those States will spring up. Cities and towns will spring up. They will draw people to them, and afford employment to those people. Electric-power development will redound in every way to the prosperity of the people of those States. There will be more people there, more people at work, more pay rolls, more money produced, more money in circulation, and more prosperity among the people of those States.

I do not think it takes a prophetic vision to see those results from the generation of cheap electrical power in that wonderfully blessed country, the great West. Now the question is, Are we going to stand still? Are we going to remain in a state of stagnation and utterly refuse to provide adequate legislation for the development of our resources and to bring about that era of prosperity, which I can easily foresee, just on account of some differences between Members of Congress over the rights of States and the rights of the Federal Government? Just on account of some notion of States' rights which prevails among some of the western Members of Congress and a fear that some mysterious power is going to take away from their States the constitutions under which they are operating, are we, just because of a stubborn difference over methods of procedure, going to maintain that stagnation which is now preventing general development in a wonderfully blessed section of the country?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I fully concur with the Senator that this development is going to take place; but the question is whether it will take place under this bill as well as it will take place where a person has the right to acquire the land for what it is worth. I do not know that the Senator has read the bill which I have offered as a substitute for this bill.

Mr. MYERS. I read it some time ago.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; that is not the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I have not seen this year's bill, then.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The bill which I have offered as a substitute provides for practically the condemnation of the land of the United States just the same as the land of an individual, and thereby title to it is acquired. If you have a lease with the Government, you are going to have clauses in the lease that make it revocable. You are going to have provisions just like you have in a house lease. Certain things have to be done by the individual. He has to pay the rental at regular intervals of time, and whenever the time comes that the Government says "No," the Government can clamp down and oust the party. Those are things that every company on earth is afraid of, and they will not go into the enterprise as freely as if they owned the title to the lands. If you provide for acquiring the title to the lands, however, together with the supervision of the utility commissions, you will find that you will have the cheapest development that can be had in the world.

Mr. MYERS. I am not at all afraid of a lack of development under the provisions of this bill if it becomes a law. I am assured that if this bill becomes a law it will result in the investment of millions of dollars in the State of Montana in the next few years, and, in fact, almost immediately. I am not a believer, either, in selling to private individuals and parting absolutely with the title of the Government to these valuable water-power sites. The lands constituting them belong to the people of all of the United States, and I think some supervision and control over them ought to be retained by the people of all of the United States. If they were sold to individuals, they would likely be sold for a song; they might be condemned for a song, and then they would be gone forever out of the hands of the people who now own them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator does believe, however, in having the Government do exactly that same thing as to railroads, does he not?

Mr. MYERS. That is a long-established system, and Congress has long ago provided a method of parting with the title to lands that railroads are seeking. I do not consider the cases analogous at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That was the system we had up to the passage of the act of 1901, too, in the case of water-power sites, and there was great development under it.

Mr. MYERS. But it was subject to a great many things of which the Senator from Colorado himself has complained—bureaucracy and regulations, which he says are invariably carried to an extreme, and which hamper and restrict development—and the land was subject to homestead entry and scripping, and a number of other ways of acquiring it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; not to bureaucracy, because the bureaucracy has occurred since 1901. That is where the bureaucracy has occurred.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator is entirely satisfied with the situation up to 1901, then? He would simply return to that system?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I would be perfectly willing for them to file on water-power land for water-power sites and then let them pay to the Government whatever that land is worth, measured by what it would bring in a condemnation suit. It seems to me that is all the Government has a right to exact, and it seems to me it would result in that.

Some years ago there was hardly any such thing as a public-utility commission. Now every State in the Union, I think, except Utah, has a public-utility commission. They are sometimes called railroad commissions, but their jurisdiction extends to every public carrier that may be incorporated in the State. I want to say, as to these Western States, that Arizona has one, California has one, Colorado has one, Idaho has one, Montana has one, Nevada has one, New Mexico has one, Oregon has one, and Washington has one.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, I know; nearly all the States have them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Every one of the States which are the subject of this matter has a public-utility commission that determines the price that can be charged persons using electricity; and every charge and every restriction that you put on here simply makes the corporation charge a higher rate, and the public-utility commission allows it.

Mr. MYERS. Then the Senator would have the Federal Government give up absolutely these valuable heritages, these water-power sites, and part forever with the title to them?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, no. I have said that they should pay for it just exactly as they would pay for my land if I owned it.

Mr. MYERS. But the Senator would have the United States part with the title to these sites?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would have the United States part with the title to them, just as I am compelled to part with the title to them. I want to say to the Senator that that was the understanding of the Western States, and I call attention to the fact that in the constitution of Colorado we provided as follows:

> All persons and corporations shall have the right of way across public, private, and corporate lands—

It will be observed that it is expressed there as "public lands"— > for the construction of ditches, canals, and flumes for the purpose of conveying water for domestic purposes, for the irrigation of agricultural lands, for mining and manufacturing purposes, and for drainage, upon payment of just compensation.

That is the constitution that was presented in compliance with the enabling act of Congress; and upon the presentation of that constitution, and its examination by the President, and his approval of it as complying with the enabling act, the proclamation was issued by which Colorado was admitted into the Union.

Mr. MYERS. What did the people of the Senator's State understand by its enabling act, which said that they forever renounced all claim to control over the public lands within the State?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, certainly they do not claim title to the lands; but they do say that where enterprises are to be undertaken, under this provision of the constitution, the right of way can be condemned by paying for it what it is worth.

Mr. MYERS. If they solemnly abandoned all interest in and forever renounced all control over the public lands within the borders of the State, they are not in a position now to complain, whether the United States Government sells or leases them, whichever it may see fit to do. If they did not want to come into the Union under those terms, they should not have accepted the enabling act and should have stayed out. I think they ought to stand by their enabling act, which solemnly renounces all claim to the control or exercise of any right over the public lands. They are not in a position now to complain if the Federal Government sees fit to lease them. They have renounced the right to complain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, no; because, as a matter of fact, the Constitution of the United States itself says that these lands shall be held until disposed of. It is a temporary trust. It has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a temporary trust.

Mr. MYERS. We are traveling in a circle. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that that does not mean merely to sell; it means to lease as well as to sell. The Senator must abide by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But they can not keep them forever unless they get the consent of the State. Whenever a public building is to be erected in a State it is not erected until the legislature of the State cedes to the United States jurisdiction over the property on which the building is to stand. Consequently, if the State wants to pass a special act of its legislature providing that a sovereignty can come in there independently of the States it can do it; but it takes the consent of the State to do it.

Mr. MYERS. I believe I will dissolve for the present my dual argumentative capacity with the Senator from Colorado, and proceed in a single capacity with my few remaining remarks.

I have said practically all I care to say about the nature and desirability of this class of legislation. I now want, before closing, to take up the bill and refer to some of the sections of it, and I shall not be very long at that.

The first section is the section which provides for the leasing of the land which constitutes the power site. It provides for a lease for 50 years. I will say that it seemed to be the general opinion of all who addressed our committee on that subject that there ought to be some definite termination of the life of the lease; that it ought to be a determinate lease; and 50 years seemed to be considered by all alike about the proper lifetime for the lease. The House of Representatives has fixed it at that, and the Senate committee last year and this year fixed it at that, and it meets with no serious complaint from anybody. I believe, myself, that 50 years is the proper period. I do not believe it ought to be any longer than that, and I do not believe it would be just or fair to make it any less than that.

From testimony before our committee, it appears that the lifetime of a power project may be divided into three periods. Experience shows that all successful projects pass through those three periods. They may be called the construction period, the development period, and the profitable period. A considerable period of time, varying at from three to five years, must elapse during which the plant may be constructed, transmission lines built, and the development of business initiated. It is fair to assume that upon the basis of a 50-year leasehold, 10 per cent of the time will have elapsed before the project is ready to render service, develop business, or pay any return upon the sums invested. During this period of inactive earning power, promotion, organization, engineering, and construction charges, together with interest on all of these necessary expenses, and taxes, have been paid, thus burdening the plant with heavy obligations before perfecting any earning capacity.

It is the policy of the Government, and should be the policy of all power producers, to develop the project to its maximum capacity. To do this it is, in the majority of cases, necessary to develop far beyond the existing market.

Every water-power company which has a growing business, and particularly those companies that are operating and contemplate operating in the sparsely settled and only partially developed regions of the West, where the proposed legislation will have its fullest application, are obliged to make heavy investments upon which no immediate return is possible. To endeavor to secure a return on total investment during this early or first period would necessitate the charging of rates so exorbitant as to preclude the development of the business and to curtail rather than extend the use of hydroelectric power. As a matter of business policy rates must of necessity, during the first period, be limited to what will pay, in many instances, a nominal return only upon the actual money invested, leaving no profit for the owner and developer of the business. This situation is realized by all conservative water-power companies, and with it comes a realization that, aside from bond interest and sinking fund requirements, additional revenues must be made by maintaining as cheap rates as possible, extending the business and substituting hydroelectric power for other means of generating power required for different industries.

During the second period of a leasehold, when the business has been developed, a fair return may be made upon the investment. Under the regulatory control of State public-service commissions only such a return as can be adequately justified may be looked for. This may be regarded as the period of profit to the owner and developer, while at the same time the public interest is conserved through the instrumentality of its commissions.

During the latter part of the leasehold the plant will inevitably be reaching a stage where maintenance and renewal charges will be heavy items. In order to properly serve the public, plants, structures, dams, transmission, and distributing systems should be maintained at the highest possible point of efficiency. Extensions should be made to meet the public need, and in the rapidly growing sections of the West these extensions require a constant expenditure of new money, amounting to a very considerable portion of the total outlay. If a company is facing a situation where its physical property may be taken over at the end of a comparatively few years, it will inevitably follow that there will be a disposition to save as much money as possible upon renewals, repairs, and extensions, and such sums as may of necessity be invested under these heads must, to as great an extent as possible, be amortized during the remainder of the lease, resulting in a constant effort to increase rates to the point where as large a rate as the customer's business will stand must be charged, and justified by the governmental agencies which have imposed upon the power concern the necessity of amortizing at least a portion of its property, not according to the standard usually adopted, to wit, that of wiping it out during the estimated life of the property itself, but by introducing the fictitious element of an expiring leasehold.

There is general agreement that the 50-year period is the proper period for leasing lands necessary for power sites. About that, I believe, there is no question. If there were as little question about everything else connected with the bill as there is about that, there would be no trouble at all about the speedy enactment of the bill into law.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years, and I submit a report (No. 260) thereon. I give notice that if I find the opportunity I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill to-morrow morning

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 16, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 15, 1916.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGES.

Joseph W. Woodrough, of Omaha, Nebr., to be United States district judge, district of Nebraska, vice William H. Munger, deceased.

Horace W. Vaughan, of Honolulu, Hawaii, now serving as assistant United States attorney, district of Hawaii, to be United States district judge, district of Hawaii, vice Sanford B. Dole, whose term expired December 16, 1915.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF SUPREME COURT OF TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Alexander G. M. Robertson, of Honolulu, Hawaii, to be chief justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Hawaii. (A reappointment, his term having expired May 15, 1915.) Mr. Robertson is now serving under a recess appointment.

SECOND JUDGE OF CIRCUIT COURT.

William L. Whitney, of Honolulu, Hawaii, to be second judge of the Circuit Court of the First Circuit of the Territory of Hawaii. (A reappointment, his term having expired May 6, 1913.) Mr. Whitney is now serving under a recess appointment.

JUDGES OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

James Wesley Thompson, of Honolulu, Hawaii, to be judge of the Circuit Court of the Third Circuit of the Territory of Hawaii, vice John A. Matthewman, whose term expired January 6, 1913.

Clement K. Quinn, of Honolulu, Hawaii, to be judge of the Circuit Court of the Fourth Circuit of the Territory of Hawaii, vice Charles F. Parsons, whose term expired January 6, 1913.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

S. C. Huber, of Tama, Iowa, to be United States attorney, district of Hawaii, vice Jeff McCarn, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 15, 1916.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Orin M. Lane to be register of the land office at Rapid City, S. Dak.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, O God, our heavenly Father, to renew our faith and confidence in Thee and in the overruling of Thy providence in the affairs of men that our spiritual life may be enlarged. Religion is the life of God in the soul. We pray for that life that our work may be increased in the things that make for the eternal good of man. We bless Thee for every true and noble life whose work has added to the sum of human happiness, touched by the death of one who has honored his life by an honorable service in the chosen field of his endeavors. Comfort his friends and family by the precious promises in the continuity of life that they may look forward with bright hopes and anticipations to a life beyond the confines of earth, where the joys of existence shall be increased and the soul shall find its full fruition in a joyful service in Thee, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that reference of the bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code, from the Committee on Claims, to which it has been referred, and which has no jurisdiction of it, to the Committee on War Claims. This is an omnibus war-claims bill encompassing certain private claims passed by the Senate and sent over here. By mistake it was referred to the Committee on Claims instead of to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for rereference of the bill referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10037) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10037, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. ASHBROOK, and Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request in respect to the bill H. R. 11078, of similar title.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the same order may be made in regard to the bill H. R. 11078, of similar title. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. ASHBROOK, and Mr. LANGLEY.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order under the rules to-day. My purpose is to take up for consideration an urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and, with the permission of the House, I desire to state that this bill contains certains items urgently requested by the Navy Department. The bill carries about two and three-quarter millions of dollars. It is to enable the Navy Department to put in effective condition the ships of the Navy now in commission. It is very important that the money be made available at once. Two establishments are now turning out certain material for the Navy, and it is stated that there is sufficient money available to enable them to be conducted at their present rate of output only until the 15th of this month.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday until he can pass the bill to which he refers or for the whole day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, and state that the purpose of the request is to enable me to call up the bill to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that possibly the best way would be to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday until the gentleman can dispose of that bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman the question raised by the suggestion of the Chair. How long does the gentleman think it will take to get through with the urgent deficiency bill? I understand there is urgent necessity of the Government; and if so, I do not think there will be any great delay in the passage of that bill. I desire to find out if we are to lose all right to Calendar Wednesday for the balance of the day if this bill should pass in, say, an hour?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That depends on how the request is put.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, I am interested in getting this particular bill disposed of.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How long does the gentleman think it will take him to do that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are only seven pages in the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman anticipate any prolonged debate over an urgent necessity of the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not. Unless there is some change in opinion, I think there would not be to exceed 30 minutes of general debate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman want to take away from us the balance of the day, Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no desire to do so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then I suggest that the gentleman put his request, as suggested by the Speaker, for the consideration of the bill to which he refers, and that no other rights of Calendar Wednesday be forfeited.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to do so.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow may be substituted for to-day as Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to substitute to-morrow for to-day as Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would have to object to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not substitute Saturday?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I could not agree to that.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of both sides of the House for a moment. This urgent deficiency appropriation bill carries nearly $3,000,000 for the Navy. That amount is urgently needed for putting ships now in commission in condition, so that they would be of some account in the event of war.

In my judgment there will be but little time taken. I should say it ought not to take more than an hour's time altogether in the consideration of the bill. Yesterday the House was unanimous, save one, for strengthening the Army. It is important, beyond the amount that it carries and from the standpoint of necessity, and I might go further and say, I think, from patriotism, that this bill should be passed, and passed at once. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, as a substitute for these other unanimous consents, to dispense with Calendar Wednesday to-day and substitute Saturday in place thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent to substitute next Saturday for the business in order on Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the committee of which I am chairman has what we consider an important bill on Calendar Wednesday. My neighbor and my lifetime personal friend, my associate, Senator SHIVELY, has passed away, and his funeral will be held on Saturday. I must attend that funeral, and if in doing so Saturday is substituted for to-day it probably necessitates my committee's losing its place on the calendar, and unless the gentleman from North Carolina withdraws his request I shall be impelled to object, much as I dislike to do so. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is there any other day that the gentleman would agree to?

Mr. BARNHART. Not this week, because we leave to-morrow noon and can not be back here before Monday morning.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina, as I understand, it will only take about two and a half hours to pass this appropriation bill to-day. Why not grant leave to bring it up and pass it and then go ahead with the regular business of Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, my thought was, with the demands for time on the sugar bill, that it would take up more than a day upon this bill, and that we could take up the sugar bill after this deficiency bill is passed and finish it up to-morrow.

Mr. BARNHART. Let the whole business go over until next Wednesday. I do not want to lose my place.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will not lose his place. There is other business on the calendar before the gentleman's bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest in addition that the gentleman's request be modified by adding that if the Committee on Printing be called it shall be passed without prejudice on Saturday.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I think the better suggestion would be to take two days next week for Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. BARNHART. That might be.

Mr. KITCHIN. The request as modified by the request of the gentleman from New York will dispose of the whole thing.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, why not have Friday, although Friday is claims day? Has the Claims Committee any bills?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the modified request that Calendar Wednesday for to-day be dispensed with and that Saturday be taken as Calendar Wednesday, with the understanding that if we reach the printing bill it will be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that next Saturday be substituted for to-day and that if the Committee on Printing is reached on Saturday it shall be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I doubt whether the heavens will fall if we should dispense with one Calendar Wednesday in order to dispatch real public business. I do not believe that we ought to make special arrangements and exceptions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order under the rule to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday in order for to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, was the request to substitute Saturday withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. No; there is no substitution about it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. If the consideration of this appropriation bill is not concluded to-day, would it go over until to-morrow as unfinished business or to the next Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. A motion would be in order to-morrow to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider it. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if it is understood now that the sugar bill comes on immediately after the completion of this bill to-day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know; I have not any control over that.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think probably the gentleman from North Carolina can tell the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. We want to take up the sugar bill so as to finish it to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FURTHER URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13043, an urgent deficiency appropriation bill; and pending that may I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if we can not agree upon a time for general debate?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that general debate might close—how much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have one gentleman who would like 10 minutes on an extraneous subject. But if there is only to be discussion on this, I think we can dispose of it under the five-minute rule, or, say, we take 30 minutes for debate, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and 15 minutes by myself.

Mr. CANNON. I would like 10 or 15 minutes, and I presume the gentleman would like a little time—more than 5 minutes—in which to explain the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us take 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. That would be satisfactory to me—15 minutes——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty minutes altogether.

Mr. CANNON. Thirty minutes on a side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from New York to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to one hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by himself and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years, with Mr. GARD in the chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $3,260,800. Of this sum, $2,575,000 is for the Navy Department. This money is requested in order to enable the various bureaus of that department to expedite essential repairs upon war vessels now in commission. In addition, it provides money to equip vessels now in commission with antiaircraft guns, to enable the Navy Department very largely to increase the number of mines originally estimated as desirable for the service, to increase considerably the number of cartridge cases deemed necessary in order to have an adequate supply of ammunition in case of necessity. The items for the Navy Department which have been included in the bill are all of a peculiarly urgent character. They are requested at this time because of the prevalent belief that all of the vessels of the Navy should be put in the most efficient condition possible.

In addition to the sums carried by the Navy Department, there is carried $72,000 for the District of Columbia. This sum is for the support of United States prisoners from the District. One hundred and five thousand dollars is carried by the Department of Justice, very largely, if not entirely, for the support of United States prisoners, due to the fact that the number of United States prisoners is in excess of the number upon which the estimates were based when the appropriations were made. In addition, there is $508,800 for the United States courts. This is to provide money for witnesses, jurors, United States commissioners' fees, and certain expenses of the United States marshals.

The items included are all of a nature to be characterized as urgent, and for that reason the committee has included them in this bill. There were some other estimates pending before the committee for deficiencies, but they did not belong in the same category as the items to which I have referred, and the committee relegated them to the general deficiency bill.

Unless some one wishes information, I shall reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the first item of the bill, an item of $60,000 for support of the convicts of the District of Columbia, what is the cause of that? That seems a rather large deficiency item for that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is due to the increased number of prisoners from the District of Columbia over the number upon which the estimates were based.

Mr. MANN. Are there so many more prisoners now than usual?

Mr. FITZGERALD. More than last year.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman have the figures? It seems remarkable to me that there should be any very great increase in the number of prisoners. Frankly, I wondered whether it had anything to do with the different method of taking care of the prisoners, which we were assured a few years ago would materially decrease the cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the causes, I might add, is that Congress provided, either last year or the year before, that hereafter in fixing the cost of taking care of District prisoners in the United States penitentiaries the overhead charges should be included as a portion of the cost, and for that reason the charge to the District for the care of prisoners is larger than it otherwise would have been.

Mr. MANN. Well, are these convicts those who are in penitentiaries only, or does it also include those down here at the workhouse at Occoquan?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in the workhouse, but in the United States penitentiaries at Leavenworth and at Atlanta.

Mr. MANN. There are a number of increases in here also for Leavenworth and Atlanta Penitentiaries and for support of United States prisoners at various places. What are those increases?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Those items are due entirely to the increased number of convicts—over 100 additional convicts in one of these places.

Mr. MANN. There is quite a large increase in the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is; for instance, the District of Columbia prisoners at the close of the fiscal year 1915 were 687, and on March 10, 1916, there were 738.

Mr. MANN. Not in penitentiaries, certainly? There were certainly not 700 prisoners from the District of Columbia in Fort Leavenworth and Atlanta Penitentiaries?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Very largely; yes. They are United States prisoners.

Mr. MANN. I know; but that would be a very large proportion of the prisoners who were in those penitentiaries. I do not think there are 3,000 prisoners in them, all told.

Mr. FITZGERALD. About 3,000. There are 1,700 and some odd at Leavenworth and about 1,300, I think, in Atlanta.

Mr. MANN. It would seem strange to one who did not know anything more about it than I do that there should be 700 out of 3,000 from the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is where they are supposed to be. Those who make the statement are in charge of the prisons, and if they are not correct I do not know where to obtain the information.

Formerly we charged the District of Columbia 35 cents for the care of each prisoner, but we did not include in that cost the overhead charges of the penitentiary. Congress inserted a provision in one of the appropriation bills requiring to be included all items of cost relating to the maintenance of the penitentiaries, and that now makes the cost 60 cents a day. As a result this year the cost of keeping the District prisoners is very nearly double.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a little further in reference to these naval items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The naval appropriation bill last year does not carry a sufficient amount, or do these items arise out of change of conditions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are three items. One is for the Bureau of Ordnance, an item of $995,000. That is to increase very largely the number of mines for the Navy. The number of mines that had been determined upon by the General Board as being necessary was 3,000, and that number will be supplied by the 1st of May. A few months ago, as the result of studies of the present European war, the General Board determined that the United States Navy should have 9,000 mines. They have been developing a plant which now has a capacity of 20 mines a day, and they desire to carry on that plant at full capacity. That will take four hundred odd thousand dollars.

Antiaircraft guns have been provided for all vessels since the Oklahoma, but the vessels in commission prior to the Oklahoma had no antiaircraft guns. Certain 1-pounder guns that were on hand were remodeled, but the department is asking $125,000 in order to provide two of those guns for each of the ships now in commission.

In addition, a certain allotment had been determined upon as the allotment of ammunition for the Navy. As the result of the study of the present European conflict, it is believed that the allotment fixed for the Navy should be very largely increased, and money is asked in order to provide cartridge cases to increase the amount of ammunition.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman refers to allotments in the Navy. Just what does he mean by that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amount that the General Board had determined was adequate.

Mr. MANN. That is the allotment under the naval appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; that is the reserve that should be had, the ammunition that should be on hand. They have increased what they believe should be on hand.

Mr. MANN. That is not an allotment of money, then?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. In addition they are asking money to provide for a larger number of reserve parts for guns, sights, telescopes, directoscopes, and a number of other apparatus. In the Bureau of Steam Engineering and the Bureau of Construction and Repair the policy has been to send ships to the navy yards at certain fixed periods and at certain times, regardless of the condition of the ships or the necessity for repairs. The policy has been changed, and since the 1st of July all repairs reported as needed upon the ships have been directed to be made. The allotment of appropriation has been waived, and the result is that there are repairs to be made that are deemed imperative on certain ships, and require in the Bureau of Steam Engineering about $900,000 and in the Bureau of Construction and Repair about $680,000. The committee believe that the money should be furnished to permit those repairs to be made at once, rather than to wait until after the 1st of July, when they would be made from the appropriations carried in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, which is how much?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 15 minutes, and reserves 15 minutes of the previous allotment of 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois for 30 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SPARKMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution providing for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army in an emergency.

The message also announced that the President had, on March 11, 1916, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 3144. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington; and

S. 3873. An act to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has said touching the necessity for the appropriations covered by the bill for naval preparedness, and I shall not take much time in general debate in discussing it and perhaps none under the five-minute rule.

I do not know that it will do any good under the present condition in the country to call attention to the want of preparedness, especially for the Navy. But the Navy is the first line of defense and offense, and the most important arm of the Government for both in the event we are to have a foreign war. By way of calling attention to the fact, however, I will state that the appropriations for the last fiscal year were insufficient, and the appropriations for the present fiscal year are insufficient. I am not now referring to the construction of new ships or any kind of craft for the public defense not now in being. Work under appropriations such as have been authorized is now, in part at least, under contract, and it might well be hoped that that work would be expedited.

But these appropriations that are recommended in this bill, amounting in the aggregate to less than $2,800,000, so far as I recollect, are for putting the ships that are now in commission in shape so that they will be competent according to their capacity as a fighting Navy. In explaining these appropriations it is proper that something should be said of the increased cost of materials, although I need not refer to that in detail, especially after the great struggle commenced across the water. I may say that in my judgment the powers that be did not grasp the situation, and that perhaps might be a criticism of Congress, although primarily, if it be criticism, it rests upon the Executive.

For instance, take the appropriation under the title "Bureau of Ordnance." The amount recommended by the heads of bureaus was not approved by the Secretary of the Navy when he submitted his estimates. Take the Bureau of Steam Engineering. There the appropriations made at the last session of the last Congress for the Navy were cut by the Secretary of the Navy $300,000 after the estimates had been submitted by the chief of that bureau. I might read the hearings covering those points, but it is not necessary to do so, and I do not know that it is indicated that I should do so at this time, because the public business crowds, and there will be time enough later on for criticism.

While we have disagreed heretofore, and perhaps may disagree again where we legitimately can—without regard to who is responsible for the condition in Mexico; as to whether mistakes have been made; as to whether the administration has intelligently performed its duty, the President being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and having charge of our diplomatic relations—it is not indicated that I should refer to those matters at this time, because we have a condition confronting us; and with this condition yesterday, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the joint resolution from his committee providing for the increase of the Army, it passed in short order; and when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, asked for a rising vote, with a full House present, every man rose and voted aye but one. There was but one negative. [Applause.]

I have examined these estimates with care. I was present at the hearings and participated in the examinations. The hearings are printed, and I will not take further time to refer to them, because there is so much business of importance pressing for consideration that there is a probability, if not an absolute certainty—at least unless we all reform; especially you gentlemen on that side, and unless we help you—the snow will find us here next fall before the adjournment of this session is reached.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. I yield to my colleague [Mr. MANN] such time as he may desire. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 9 minutes and therefore would have 21 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 21 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the House this morning by unanimous consent dispensed with proceedings under the rule providing for the call of committees on Calendar Wednesday, a thing which has seldom, or I think I might accurately say never has been done before. Yesterday the House by unanimous consent proceeded to the consideration of a joint resolution providing for an increase in the Army. The joint resolution of yesterday had special reference to the situation on our Mexican border, but the unanimous consent given to-day, in order to take up the deficiency bill carrying $2,500,000 for the Navy, has no reference whatever to the situation on the Mexican border; and it seems to me that it is worthy of passing notice that when a real situation confronts the country, and the administration in charge of affairs expresses to Congress the need of additional money in order to put the country in proper shape for its own protection, it meets with a ready response from all sides of the House, and I believe from all parts of the country. There need be no fear that whenever a situation arises immediately in front of us we will all be ready to make proper appropriations of money, or I might say of life.

I fear sometimes that we have to wait until the immediate situation faces us instead of seeing far enough into the future to provide for emergencies in advance of their arriving. I think it would be very profitable to the country if Congress at this time, and without further delay, should devote its attention to the subject of proper preparation of the country for its defense [applause] ahead of the little chicken-feed bills which constantly, and properly, drift before the House from the committees of the House. This is a situation and a time when we might well delay the determination of the question whether we shall erect a statue to some hero of the country or provide for additional methods of gathering statistics, or even for the manner of doing the official printing of the Government, in order that we may with our best judgment determine speedily what we are intending to do about a proper increase in military and naval preparedness. If it be done at all, it were best that it be done quickly, in my opinion. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has discussed the exact question to which I was going to address myself, and, as he always does, he has done it better than I should have done it, so I just wish to add a word which illustrates from this bill the argument he made, that there ought to be a look into the future, and that we ought by legislation as well as by administrative action to prepare in advance and not wait until the moment when a project is forced upon us.

This appropriation for the Navy is quite justified and necessary. But I criticize the fact that it is brought before us on this bill and was not brought before us earlier in the session. This Congress has already passed two deficiency bills, the last of which was signed by the President only last month. This proposition for the Navy ought to have been in that bill, and it seems to me reprehensible that the Navy Department should not have known, sometime in January or December, in fact long before that, the items in this deficiency bill were needed by the Navy and should not have included them in the former bill. It takes the time of the committee and the time of the House to have one deficiency bill brought up, and then, after that has gone through and been signed by the President, to have another one follow immediately on its heels, when the subject matter more properly belonged in the earlier bill.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Can the gentleman state in that connection why the committee has not seen fit to cover into this bill the estimates of deficiency submitted by the Navy Department for its Bureau of Yards and Docks?

Mr. GILLETT. I refer the gentleman to the chairman of the committee [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is responsible for that. He can answer that in his time.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman has criticized the department. I thought I would inquire on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield or does he decline?

Mr. GILLETT. I prefer that the chairman of the committee should answer the criticisms on this bill, because he is responsible for it and I am not.

Mr. ROGERS. I notice that the first urgent deficiency bill of this Congress was reported on January 19 and the second on March 11. Can the gentleman inform the House whether it is customary for a second urgent deficiency bill to be brought in as early as the second week in March?

Mr. GILLETT. It is not customary; it is quite unusual; but still emergencies do arise. While it is not customary, it is not unprecedented, and if an emergency arises which could not have been foreseen by a wide-awake administration in time to have been included in the previous bill no one could criticize. But there has been no emergency as to the Navy which ought not to have been foreseen long ago. It is nearly a year since this administration adopted a tone in our foreign policy which tended to excite the resentment of great military powers. We have done nothing practically to prepare ourselves to meet that resentment. It seems to me that our domestic policy ought in some degree to conform to our foreign policy; and it seems to me, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested, that we should look forward, and that the administration should not wait until an obstacle is reached and right before its eyes before appealing to Congress for relief. As I recall, there were recommendations by the Navy Department in the former deficiency bill, and this one ought to have been included. That was its appropriate time, and the committee and the Congress should not be troubled by the administration with this constant succession of estimates, when all of them, with a little foresight, might have been grouped together and decided at one time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has 9 minutes remaining and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think there will be anything said on this side except one or two observations by myself.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I should like to propound to the chairman of the committee the question which I presented to the gentleman from Massachusetts, in regard to the failure to include in this bill the deficiency estimates for the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there were some estimates submitted by the Bureau of Yards and Docks which were to take care of a number of small items in practically every navy yard in the United States. Upon an examination of the items it seemed to the committee that they were not matters of urgent or immediate importance. They were to provide slight improvements here and there, some trifling additions to the yard facilities that properly should be carried in the annual appropriation act. For those reasons the committee, desiring to include in this bill only those things that could be justified because of imperative necessity for immediate action, did not include any items for yards and docks.

This administration is only human. It does not possess, nor does it profess to possess, all of the wisdom of all the men who ever lived, and particularly it does not claim to possess as much wisdom as many Republicans in this House imagine that they have. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman see any reason why these appropriations could not have been foreseen by the administration in time for the previous deficiency bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can see a great number of reasons, Mr. Chairman, why they could not have been foreseen or anticipated. Some of them, I understand, are the result of the creation by Congress in the current naval appropriation act of a new bureau or establishment or service in the naval department under the title of aid of operations by which a new policy was established in connection with certain work of the Navy, and as a result of which special efforts have been made to put these vessels into commission. So far as I know these estimates were submitted as rapidly as they could have been. There is no division in this House on two matters. One is that already discussed by that side of the House—that is, that whenever it comes to the question of providing the necessary funds and means to enable this Government to maintain its dignity and honor as a Nation and the rights of its citizens this House acts with practical unanimity. The other is that all administrations, regardless of their political complexion, must observe the laws enacted by Congress for the submission of estimates. Unless those laws are observed, unless there be some peculiar condition, such, for instance, as putting naval vessels in the best possible condition for immediate service, Congress has uniformly insisted that the departments manage their affairs without additional funds until they have complied with the law. Unless some extraordinary emergency arises connected with the public defense, or an equally good cause, additional funds before the time for the enactment of the general deficiency bill will not be provided for any service, as there will be no further deficiency bill during this session of Congress. I ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to use any time?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is undoubtedly a sharp difference of opinion among Members of the House relative to the size and character of the Military and Naval Establishments which we should provide at this session of Congress for the future. It is to be hoped that out of the discussion that will take place when the bills are presented from the Naval and Military Committees we will be able to so adjust and compromise our views as to come to a substantial agreement as a House as to the progress we should make and as to the goal for which we should aim in the development of our military establishments.

When, however, we come to consider the question of immediate preparation, such as may be needed or necessary, there is not, has not been, and will not be any material difference of opinion on the floor. Yesterday, as the gentleman from Illinois has reminded us, the House almost unanimously provided for an immediate increase in our Military Establishment. The House is now proposing to speed up on certain needed work of the Navy. We will all of us be united in work of this character. As a matter of fact, as a member of the committee, while I shall support the committee in the action it has taken, I would have been very glad indeed to have approved all of the estimates made on behalf of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. For while I think it is true, as the chairman of the committee has stated, that these additional amounts are not imperative and immediately essential, still it seems to me we are confronting a situation and condition in which we should err, if at all, on the side of providing all, or even more, than may be absolutely essential in the speeding up of the work of preparation for whatever the future may hold for us.

It is unfortunate, in my opinion, that we have been so slow in the construction of the vessels which have been authorized by Congress. If we could have speeded up, if we could have moved with the rapidity in the construction of the ships that have been authorized that private concerns have moved in filling foreign contracts, we would to-day be in a much better condition of preparedness than we find ourselves. Therefore I think it is the duty of Congress, and I think there should be no dissenting voice in regard to that, to supply every dollar that the department believes necessary in order to make the establishments we now have and for which we have made provision, immediately effective and available. That is the kind of preparedness that we all can unite on. Other questions of how and to what extent we shall expand to meet future emergencies or future possibilities, we will meet as they are presented to us in the bills that will be brought to our attention.

In that connection, as one of those who have not been inclined to accept or approve of the great programs that have been proposed in certain quarters, I want to commend the Committee on Military Affairs for the bill which it has presented to the House. That bill, it seems to me, provides a reasonable, moderate, and yet quite sufficient preparation for the future. I hope, when we reach this and other bills of this character, we may find an agreement in the House along moderate lines for increase and development of our armed forces.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used seven minutes of the nine minutes remaining. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to use the remaining time?

Mr. CANNON. I do not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

For ordnance and ordnance stores, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $995,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I did not get exactly what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said a while ago about the increase of the number of mines which could be manufactured. My attention was diverted at the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Four hundred thousand dollars are appropriated because of the increase in the number of mines, and $129,000 I think for antiaircraft guns. Over a hundred thousand dollars are appropriated for cartridge cases. That is, the brass shell. There is also money for spare telescopes, sights, and directoscopes.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask about the mines. Do we have a surplus supply of mines on hand?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The number fixed as the number we should have was 3,000, and they will be on hand by the 1st of May. They keep indefinitely.

Mr. MANN. Do these mines keep indefinitely?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do. They manufacture the cases and load them.

Mr. MANN. They have been in the habit, as I recollect, of making 10 mines a day at this Government establishment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The plant had a capacity of 10 mines a day; it now has a capacity of 20 mines a day.

Mr. MANN. Of course it would not take very long to make 3,000 mines at 10 mines a day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bureau will have the full 3,000 by the 1st of May, and is now working upon an allotment of 9,000 mines.

Mr. MANN. I should think they would want a hundred thousand mines.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They say not. These are mines that are used by the Navy as distinct from the mines that are used by the Army in connection with the coast defenses.

Mr. MANN. I suppose these are mines that they use to strew over the sea?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know how many they should have except that the General Board fixed on 9,000.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, in view of what is going on on the other side of the water, a thousand mines does not mean very much. I suppose they do not last very long after they are in the water. They float away from where they are deposited and I suppose sink. With the capacity now of 10 mines a day, of course in a year's time they would make 3,000 mines, and with a capacity of 20 mines a day they would make about 6,000 in a year's time. I should think they ought to have quite an accumulation in the way of surplus if they do not deteriorate. I do not wish to ask for information that is kept secret, but I take it that this is all public property.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Admiral Strauss was asked whether the contents of the mine was put into the mine case when it was manufactured. He said that it was. He was asked if there was any deterioration by reason of the age of the mine, and he said not so far as they knew. So that when these mines are manufactured and then loaded, so far as the Bureau of Ordnance knows, they last indefinitely, until ready for use.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman have any information as to the supposed cost of these mines, per unit?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This four hundred thousand and odd dollars will supply about eighteen hundred mines. I think the statement was made as to the cost of each mine, some $315. That includes the royalty which they pay of $100 a mine.

Mr. MANN. To whom does that royalty go?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To the Vickers Co., of England. The contract price is $490. We manufacture them for $215 and the royalty is $100 additional.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by the contract price? These are made by the Government, are they not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happened was this: We made a contract with this company to furnish a certain number of mines, with the privilege of manufacturing an equal number without the payment of a royalty. The outbreak of the war in Europe made it impossible for the English concern to manufacture any for this Government, and then an arrangement was made by which this Government was given the right to manufacture the mines and pay a royalty. The contract price my recollection is was some $490.

Mr. MANN. So that we are dependent in this country for our mines for the Navy upon a patent owned by some English people?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are manufacturing under a patent which is held by the Vickers Co.

Mr. MANN. We give them a patent in this country, which requires us to pay more than 25 per cent of the cost as a present to the patentee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Admiral Strauss made the following statement:

Admiral STRAUSS. We made a contract with the Vickers Co. by which we were permitted to manufacture 1,100 of those mines in this country free of royalty, provided we purchased from them 1,100 mines at $490 apiece. They had begun the manufacture of our 1,100 mines in England when the war broke out, and England stopped export of munitions. So they permitted us to make their 1,100 mines, paying a royalty of $100 apiece.

The CHAIRMAN. What arrangement has been made regarding additional mines?

Admiral STRAUSS. We have an agreement by which subsequent mines are reduced in royalty on a sliding scale, and they got down to $70 finally.

Including every overhead charge, they cost $215 and the royalty of $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Including every conceivable cost, it makes, including the royalty, $345, as against $490, the contract price.

Mr. MANN. What did we do for mines before we found these English people?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We did not have this type.

Mr. MANN. Have we thrown away those we did have as being valueless, does the gentleman know?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. We did not inquire about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For construction and repair of vessels, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $680,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What about?

Mr. GARDNER. About the naval question—the Bureau of Construction and Repair. I will say to the gentleman that, not having my papers here, I did not like to object to his unanimous consent to consider this bill, but I said to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that I would take my matter up under the five-minute rule, and I went home to get my papers and I desire that I should have an opportunity to go ahead.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman's discussion germane to this bill?

Mr. GARDNER. It is germane to the Bureau of Construction and Repair. I will put it this way: If the gentleman thinks that any part of my discussion is not germane, he can stop me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to do that. I am anxious, I will say to the gentleman, to dispose of the bill so that we may go on with the sugar bill.

Mr. GARDNER. I think, in view of the fact, as the gentleman from Illinois knows, and in view of the fact, as the gentleman himself knows, he can not stop discussion, he had better let me go ahead for 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What I desire to avoid upon this bill is getting into a general discussion that will prolong its consideration.

Mr. GARDNER. It is almost unavoidable when you bring up a matter affecting the Bureau of Construction and Repair——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it is not unavoidable; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, I do not know about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he may proceed for 15 minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I will not object, and I hope this will end the discussion of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, without any desire to cast any reflection on the Bureau of Construction and Repair as at present constituted, the whole thing ought to be overhauled. A few days ago—to be accurate, on the 11th day of March—the superdreadnaught Nevada went into commission, with Capt. Sims in command. That was just five years and seven days after we voted and appropriated money to start the building of the Nevada. Five years and seven days; and the superdreadnaught Oklahoma was authorized the same day and she is not commissioned yet.

Now, let us look at the question of the general condition of our Bureau of Construction and Repair. I hold in my hand a bulletin of that bureau of the date of March 10, five days ago, showing the facts as to vessels of the Navy now under construction. The G–2 and G–3 submarines authorized in 1908 and 1909 are not finished. Of the seven L submarine boats, authorized in 1912 and 1913, not one is commissioned yet. Of the N submarine boats, authorized in 1914, the nearest to completion is 55 per cent complete. Those N boats were authorized 20 months ago. Eighteen submarines were authorized on March 3, 1915, slightly over a year ago. Two of them, both seagoing submarines, have been bid on and we rejected the bids, but of the other 16 here is the condition: On 10 of them not one stroke of work has yet been done, and yet they were authorized a full year ago. Of the other six O submarines, here is the state of completion: The O–11 is 3.6 per cent complete; the O–12 is 3.9 per cent complete; the O–13 is 3.7 per cent complete; the O–14, the O–15, and O–16 are each 4 per cent complete. Now, that needs looking into.

I am not going to blame the present administration of the Navy. It is perfectly obvious from the evidence given by Admiral Winslow and Capt. Sims who commands the superdreadnaught Nevada, that has just been put in commission, that it is not the fault of the present administration any more than of prior administrations, but it is perfectly clear that the misleading that has been going on is the fault of the present administration. The public does not watch those things, but now we are told that the Navy lives in a state of preparedness. That statement was in the report of the Secretary of the Navy made to Congress in the fall of 1914, and at that very time, according to the evidence of Admiral Winslow and Capt. Sims, the Navy was not in a state of preparedness. Target practice had been going from bad to worse until it was rotten, and here this has been going on in the Bureau of Construction and Repair——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. And not one word was said about the matter until brought out by the gentleman from Michigan—I can not yield to the gentleman now—when Mr. KELLEY brought out by his resolution the condition of affairs that prevailed in the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Now we are beginning to find out the facts. Now we find that the condition of submarine construction and the condition of battleship construction are only samples of what has been going on. So much for construction; how about repairs? Let us look into that. Let us find out what is the matter with the 16,000-ton battleships. What about the 16,000-ton battleships? I do not mean the Michigan or the South Carolina, but the six 16,000-ton battleships built previous to them. They all, except the Kansas and perhaps one other, have a defect in their construction. I believe that the trouble is known as torsional vibration. Four of them are unserviceable at fleet speeds between 12 and 15 knots an hour and are often in danger of breaking a shaft. Of those 16,000-ton battleships, four out of six at this moment are out of repair or they are in the navy yards laid up. We ought to look into that. Let us first find out whether we are getting the facts; let us find out whether we are getting the facts about our submarine conditions also.

Now, I am going to read to you a statement of a press notice of the Navy Department under date of May 7, 1915, and in case anyone should think that this press notice is not the correct press notice given out by the Navy Department let me say I have been months chasing up my facts, and finally I got the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to write to the department for this press notice. When it came back I asked him to initial it, so that there could not be the slightest doubt of its authenticity, and I have in my hand that initialed copy.

Listen to this statement as to our submarines in the notice handed out by the Navy Department on May 7 last:

After a continuous and uninterrupted run of about 1,200 miles, one of the longest steady runs ever accomplished by American submarines, the second and fourth divisions of the Atlantic Submarine Flotilla have arrived at New York from Pensacola, Fla., via Key West, which port was their last stopping place.

A 1,200-mile run for the second and fourth divisions of the submarines! And every newspaper in the country heralded that feat. The New York World commented on it as "breaking the world's record." The statement continues, as follows:

The second division consists of the D–1, D–2, D–3, E–1, and E–2, and the fourth division of the K–1, K–2, K–5, and K–6.

The starting point of the cruise was Pensacola, Fla., where both flotillas, with their tenders, had been engaged for the last four months in drills and exercises in cooperation with a mining division and the Aeronautical Corps stationed at the same place.

Now, listen to that. The second division and fourth division made a 1,200 mile run! It was a world-breaking performance record, as the New York World put it. Let us see whether those submarines actually made any such run. I state it as a fact, sir—and I invite an investigation—that the D–1, the D–2, and the D–3 were not there at all. They never started from Pensacola. They joined that submarine fleet off the Jersey coast, coming from Annapolis. I say this, further, that the K–1 was towed, because both engines were unavailable. I have not been able to ascertain whether the K–1 was towed the entire journey or not, but she left Key West in tow. I say this, furthermore, that the E–2 was towed by the antique monitor Tonopah. Out of her six days' journey from Key West I think that E–2 was towed for five days.

Now, there is the actual record of the second division, which, according to the department's notice, started from Pensacola. Remember that this statement went all over the country. Let me summarize the record of those five vessels in the second submarine division. The D–1, the D–2, and the D–3 were not on the cruise at all until it was almost finished. The E–2 was towed. Let us see about the E–1, the only other submarine in the second division. The E–1 arrived at Tompkinsville, N. Y., on the morning of May 5, having made the trip under her own engines from Key West, although she had encountered repeated engine trouble during the trip.

There you have the actual condition of the second division submarine fleet. Compare those facts with the press notice of the Navy Department. Remember that in addition the K–1, of the fourth submarine division, was towed. Gentlemen, I invite an investigation. I challenge an investigation of those facts, and I am ready to go on the witness stand and say where I got the information. And I am ready to tell what officers ought to be summoned and what enlisted men.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Who gave out that report? Did any individual give it out?

Mr. GARDNER. That is the regular mimeograph report handed out by the Navy Department for publication on May 7 last. A little while ago I got Congressman ROBERTS, of Massachusetts, to write to the Navy Department for an original copy. When the copy came to hand I got Mr. ROBERTS to initial it so that there would be no mistake, and you will see the letters "E. W. R." up in the corner.

But I have other matters to bring up. The sensible thing for us to do is to build our Navy into second place among the world's navies as quickly as we can, and leave the question of building our Navy into first place to be decided after we have gotten into second place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy suggested four capital ships for our program this year, two battle cruisers and two dreadnaughts, and when he was asked why he did not suggest more he said that that would tax the building capacity of the country. Now, I can not prove that he said it. I only know that he was alleged in the newspapers to have said so. I am going to read to you a statement attributed to Secretary Daniels taken from the Washington Times of December 24, as follows:

There are only five American shipyards equipped to build capital ships, Secretary Daniels said. These are the private yards of Cramps & Sons at Philadelphia, the New York Shipbuilding Co. at Camden, and the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. and the New York and Mare Island Navy Yards. These yards, he said, can build only one warship each in three years.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the president of the National Security League, in December, told me that Secretary Daniels had asserted that his program utilized all our shipbuilding facilities. Accordingly I took the precaution to write to the Admiral of the Navy, George Dewey, to find out what the facts actually were, so that I might be posted before the question could come up. I wrote to Admiral Dewey on December 22, and I said:

I am anxious to know how many dreadnaughts and battle cruisers can simultaneously be built in this country, and I should appreciate it if you could give me the following information:

1. How many ways capable of being occupied by battleships and battle cruisers are now available in all our shipbuilding yards, public and private?

2. How many additional ways could be constructed and how long would it take to construct them?

To this Admiral Dewey replied in a letter which showed that instead of exhausting our building facilities with 4 capital ships we can in reality build at least 16 capital ships simultaneously, if we care to make a few slight changes in our yards. Here is Admiral Dewey's letter:

OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL OF THE NAVY,
Washington, December 24, 1915.

Mr. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, requesting a reply to the following questions:

1. How many ways capable of being occupied by battleships and battle cruisers are now available in all our shipbuilding yards, public and private?

Including the building slips now occupied by vessels in the course of construction, the following are at present available capable of being occupied by battleships and battle cruisers:

New York Navy Yard	1
Mare Island Navy Yard	1
Cramp Shipbuilding Co	2
Newport News Shipbuilding Co	2
New York Shipbuilding Co	2
Fore River Shipbuilding Co	2
Total	10

2. How many additional ways could be constructed, and how long would it take to construct them?

The shipbuilding industry of the country would be capable of expansion to meet almost any demand that might reasonably be made upon it. It would be impossible to state the total number of slips that could be made ready in a short time, but additional slips could at least be installed at the following places:

Union Iron Works, San Francisco; Maryland Steel Co., New York Navy Yard, Philadelphia Navy Yard, Norfolk Navy Yard, Puget Sound (Bremerton) Navy Yard.

Sincerely, yours,
GEORGE DEWEY.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FARR. May I suggest there that Admiral Stanford says that we can build 15 dreadnaughts in the Government yards?

Mr. GARDNER. Admiral Stanford says 15 dreadnaughts. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we find out the truth about the Bureau of Construction and Repair; I suggest that we find out the truth about our submarines; I suggest that we find out the truth about this Navy press bureau and these newspaper statements which purport to be interviews with Secretary Daniels.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will you answer a question, please? Going back to the delay in the construction of these battleships, I would like to inquire whether or not the contracts on the part of the Government for their construction contained a time limit, or are they to build them ad libitum?

Mr. GARDNER. I can not tell, but I know the Secretary of the Navy made a contract last March to build the seagoing submarine Schley. How long do you suppose he allowed the contractor for the completion of that vessel? He gave the Electric Boat Co. three years in which to build the Schley. Think of that! Right in the middle of this European war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would be a reasonable time?

Mr. GARDNER. I have not any idea. Mr. Powell, the president of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., as I am told, stated to the Congressman from your State who is on the Naval Affairs Committee that in five months his company had constructed 10 submarines of the H type in sections. Furthermore, he told your colleague that these sections had been put together in Montreal and that the finished submarines had crossed the ocean on their own bottoms and that they are giving absolute satisfaction.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. In view of the facts that the gentleman stated, does he not think that it would be wise to appropriate money to equip navy yards, so that the Government navy yards may build these ships?

Mr. GARDNER. I would equip Government navy yards and I would equip private shipbuilding yards. I would force the whole country's building capacity to the utmost, and I would do it as quickly as we can; and then, if there is any disarmament in sight, we can stop. [Applause.]

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Permit me to state that Admiral Stanford, before the Committee on Naval Affairs, said that we could build 15 dreadnaughts in Government yards with certain additions, and that these yards, most of them, could be equipped in six months and all of them within a year for the building of dreadnaughts. Now, I want to repeat a question similar to the one asked of you by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]. Would it not be advisable——

The CHAIRMAN. The time requested by and allotted to the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. FARR. I just want one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I modify my request and ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. I just started to say what I think ought to be investigated.

Mr. FARR. Should not the sum of $25,000,000 be immediately appropriated to equip Government yards for the building of large ships?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not care what it costs; I will vote for any amount that is requested to equip Government yards for building capital ships or any other kind of warships. I do not pretend to believe in Government building more than I do in private building, but I believe in forcing to the utmost the entire capacity of this country for the purpose of getting us ready as quickly as it can be done. [Applause.]

One thing more, Mr. Chairman. I said I believed in investigating the condition of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. I want to say most emphatically that I think Admiral Taylor is a first-class man, with the best intentions in the world, but that the Bureau of Construction and Repair has for years been going along at a leisurely pace, absolutely inadequate to meet the necessities of the times. It is not the bureau's fault. It is the fault of the various Secretaries of the Navy. It has been the fault of the public, and it is now the fault of the man who failed to call our attention to these utterly indefensible facts.

There are plenty of other things connected with the Navy to be investigated. I want especially to find out how these incorrect statements purporting to come from Secretary Daniels continue to find their way into so many papers. For instance, on May 28 various newspapers published a statement purporting to come from the Secretary that bids on 25 new submarines would be invited the next week. The truth was, as everyone who followed such matters knew, that only 18 new submarines had been provided by Congress. As a matter of fact, bids were only invited on 16 when the time came. When I find the same incorrect statement running through all the newspapers, I want to find out where it originates. I asked a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs to take that statement from the Washington Times which I read to you and find out if he could whether it was authentic. He agreed to inquire of the Navy Department, but as yet he tells me he has been able to find out nothing. I think we have a right to know such things.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Detection and prosecution of crimes: For the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $25,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what reason was given for this increased expenditure of $25,000 for the Department of Justice, and for what purpose the money has been used that makes this necessary, if the gentleman has got any such information?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have information, information that considerable work has been done in the investigation of offenses against the neutrality laws.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have some information in regard to the expenditure of the money in the Department of Justice, and I have sufficient information to lead me to believe that if the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was serving its purpose it would now be investigating that department; and if it did, it would find that money there has been wasted by trying to secure false information against reliable and peaceable citizens, law-abiding citizens. Also, perhaps, if they would go into it far enough, they would find that the money of the Department of Justice had been used to pry into and perhaps annoy at times even Members of Congress, without any justification whatever.

In my opinion, if the Members of Congress want this money spent in accordance with the law, and unless they want to encourage money being spent in conflict with law—money being spent by officials who are backed up by the Department of Justice in endeavoring to indict peaceable, law-abiding citizens that are as innocent as any citizen of the country—that information can be obtained, and it seems to me that that part of this bill should not be allowed.

It might be felt that under the circumstances I perhaps ought to let some one else debate this question and talk in regard to it, but I will say that, owing to the fact that I have been placed in the condition I have been and under the circumstances I have been, it has been necessary for me to make certain investigations, and I happen to know how that money has been spent. I do not say that I can prove this to the satisfaction of everyone, but I do believe that if there was an honest and earnest investigation made by a committee of this House, for instance, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, there would be information obtained that certainly would warrant curtailing the expenditure of money in the Department of Justice.

Also, I find that the money is being spent to investigate labor troubles. That is in conflict with the purpose of an act of Congress. I know that money is being spent for purposes other than those for which Congress appropriated it. I withdraw my pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, and offer an amendment to strike out that $25,000 in the last paragraph read there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the paragraph. Does the Chair understand that that is the motion of the gentleman?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes; the last paragraph, ending with "$25,000"; beginning on line 3 and ending on line 7, page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN moves to strike out the paragraph on page 4, lines 3 to 7, inclusive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. This appropriation is the fund out of which the Department of Justice employs special agents for the purpose of obtaining information relative to crimes in violation of the laws of the United States. During the past year there have arisen a number of instances in which violations of our neutrality laws have been alleged. It has been necessary to employ additional men to prevent the recurrence of outrages which have shocked and horrified the country, in the nature of the destruction of private property by violence.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If the gentleman had information that these same agents had been using their time and the money of the Government to secure perjured evidence, then would he be in favor of leaving an item of that sort in the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would, and I would have those persons sent to jail, where they belong, if they are guilty of such conduct; but I would not give immunity to every criminal in the United States because some employees of the Government are crooks who ought to be in jail.

At present, Mr. Chairman, we have a condition on the Mexican border where it is necessary for the Department of Justice to detail men to prevent violations of the neutrality laws for the protection of citizens of the United States in their lives and property. We must have persons to secure information in order to prosecute criminals, and we can not obtain the information unless we employ the persons and appropriate the money. If those agents violate the law themselves and do wrong, they ought to be prosecuted; but I am not prepared to take the position that the entire judicial establishment of the United States is so unreliable, so incompetent, or so inefficient that we ought to refuse the money which is essential for its proper conduct because of alleged misdoings upon the part of some employee. I believe this money is imperatively required by the Department of Justice at this time, and therefore I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the natural feeling that my colleague has upon this subject, and it may be a very just feeling. However, it is true that at this time there are a good many things that probably ought to be done and probably are being done by the Department of Justice in order to uphold not merely the rights of our country but the dignity of our country. It is inevitable that with the conflict going on in Europe there should be efforts in this country not merely to violate the laws of neutrality, but very likely efforts have been made to commit crimes in this country by the destruction of manufacturing establishments engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war. Whether we ought to permit munitions of war to be made here and exported is a matter for this country to determine, not for somebody else on the other side of the water to endeavor to determine through the commission of crime in this country. And it seems to me that we might well say to the Department of Justice, preserve the neutrality laws, obtain information as to their violation, and if anyone, either through misguided sentiment or by reason of the payment of money, endeavors to destroy our own establishments here, because he may think it is not to the interest of a foreign Government to have those establishments running, we ought to prosecute any such person, and the Department of Justice ought to have enough money to enable them to search out these things. We can not afford to let the war in Europe become a local, minimized war at different places in this country. We must uphold our dignity at home.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I hope I have not said anything that would leave the impression on the mind of anyone within the sound of my voice that I disapprove of prosecuting criminals, those who attempt to blow up or otherwise illegally obstruct any of our manufacturing plants, no matter what they are manufacturing.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman certainly conveyed no such impression to my mind. What I said was not based upon the gentleman's remarks, but upon the fact that he moved to strike out the item.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I thought, perhaps, some gentleman might think it was due to the fact that I myself have been indicted. Of course I know that I was indicted without justification. You gentlemen may not know that, but I do know it. But I have information that can not be refuted that while, perhaps, the purposes for which the Department of Justice have asked this money are proper, they have not used it for those purposes, and I do not believe they intend to do so. After it has been shown that the agents of that department have misused their time and abused their official power, if there was any indication that they were willing to remove employees and officials of that kind, then we might have sufficient confidence to appropriate more money for the same purpose; but my case is only one among many. There were citizens taken from Chicago to New York, for instance, who were never brought before the grand jury. After they were unable to get them to say the things before the district attorney they were wanted to say they were sent back to Chicago without ever being put before the grand jury, but the expense was incurred just the same. After the officials of the Department of Justice could not get them to say what they wanted to say they were sent back; and, by the way, it ought to be called hyphenated justice or something of that sort. Now, is it possible that there is no Government official in Chicago who could have found out that those men did not know anything that would help in the prosecution of somebody who had happened to make himself disliked to these usurpers of power? I say that when a public official usurps power and abuses power he is committing a crime; and when that usurpation of power means denying to peaceable and law-abiding citizens their constitutional and fundamental rights it means that by that usurpation of power they have committed a great crime, and I say some action ought to be taken against Government official abuse of power. It seems to be a growth, something that has grown up, that has been going on for years. It is not this administration alone that has practiced it; they have acquiesced in and continued to build up that vicious system. Unless it is stopped the efforts of our forefathers were without avail. Unless it is stopped it will eventually result in destroying democracy. The manner in which the department is making use of the Government funds should be disapproved of by striking out this item.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is a great deal of warrant in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]. It depends largely on what the additional secret service is to do. Some say the condition down on the border will be evidence that we ought to have additional secret-service men to hunt out wrong or treachery against the United States. With that I fully agree, but if it is for the purpose only of discovering whether there are people attempting to stop the manufacture of products in this country, the manufacture of munitions, then I question very much the wisdom of the appropriation. The newspapers have been filled full from day to day of statements that plants have been blown up; that there are obstructions here and obstructions there, and with all these charges no one has been convicted, and it has been going on ever since we began to make munitions for abroad. We have been forgetful, evidently, of this fact, that every plant that has been making munitions has been put on double and treble time. Every old tub that could be brought into use to turn something out in the munition line has been put on; they have employed green men, men unaccustomed to making these products. Why, I understand the powder companies have increased the product of their plants 1,200 per cent in 11 months. Is it possible to do so without a great many natural accidents? Anyone who has worked in a factory or in a mill knows that putting on speed pressure, additional work, is bound to bring accidents, and many of them.

First, we ought to examine into the condition of the factory and see whether the employees are capable; see whether they have men accustomed to this work; see whether they are properly safeguarded against accident; and if you do that I think you will find that in a large number of cases the statements made in the newspapers are wrong, and that the accidents have happened in natural ways.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] to strike out the section will not prevail. All of us who know our colleague from Illinois very deeply regret the embarrassing circumstances brought about by the activity of some prejudiced or incompetent or overly persistent Government employee.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If the gentleman is under that impression, I want to put him right on it. Whatever trouble I have I am willing to shoulder myself and comes from the administration here in Washington. Do not lay it on some employee. Whatever an employee did in regard to that he did by direction.

Mr. HOWARD. I am delighted to know that my colleague has located exactly the place from which this pressure comes, and I hope that eventually he will be vindicated. But the question that I want to present for the consideration of the House is this: I believe that the people as a whole of this country have more respect for the laws of the Federal Government than they have for the laws of any particular State in the Union. The reason they have that respect for the Federal statute and in some cases disrespect for the State statute is the absolute certainty of punishment that will be visited upon a person who violates the Federal statute; the apprehension of those who violate the Federal criminal statutes has been brought about by the liberality with which Congress has dealt in allowing sufficient appropriations that criminals could be detected and brought to trial.

It is a very serious thing to have a Department of Justice at this particular time in the affairs of our country make an estimate for an appropriation which in amount is meager—$25,000—and then have Congress, without due consideration, deny to this department the amount that they have asked for to carry on these particular investigations which are so necessary for the preservation of our laws at this time. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I hope there will not be a dissenting voice against this provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation available to the Department of Justice this year for this purpose was $485,000. Last year a little over $14,000 was expended for services in the investigation of violations of the neutrality laws. In the first six months of the current year $46,000 were expended for the same purpose. These investigations included passport frauds, interstate shipments of dynamite, fitting out expeditions in this country against countries with which we are at peace, and violations of a number of other laws. Because of the peculiar conditions some additional employees were necessary. I have no information as to the situation stated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman stated this became necessary on account of the Mexican trouble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not exactly. I said that there are some expenses that result from conditions on the border.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the Department of Justice do anything when the Army is in control?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are agents along the border investigating for the Department of Justice. Attempts have been made from time to time to violate the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I understand there has been some money spent in Texas by the Department of Justice that is not in accord with the ideas of the people of Texas. I do not know whether this is for that service or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is the fund out of which are paid the men who secure information of violations against the law, in order that the Department of Justice may prosecute those who violate the law.

The department has not asked for an extraordinarily large sum, and in my opinion it is our duty to give the department $25,000 at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILLIAM H. CARTER for three days, on account of illness.

SUGAR.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913.

Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to six hours, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and one-half by myself.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would make that at least six hours. I have requests for three hours.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have suggested six hours. We can agree to this now, and to-morrow perhaps I will be able to grant the gentleman more time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, of course, desires to finish the bill to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is not likely that there will be any debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. MANN. Why not make an agreement that general debate shall close at half past 4 to-morrow, and that the time between now and that time shall be divided equally between the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us put it at 4 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I would have no objection; but I think that half past 4 would enable us to pass the bill by 5 o'clock.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us put it at 4 o'clock.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to make that half past 4, and if we can get through earlier than that I will be very glad to agree to do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would give us practically two hours and a half this afternoon and four hours to-morrow.

Mr. FORDNEY. Half past 4 would grant us 7 hours.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill continue until to-morrow at 4.30 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina, pending his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill shall not extend beyond 4.30 o'clock p. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Yes; one half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and the other half by the gentleman from Michigan. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that there probably will be a fifth wheel to this wagon. As I understand it, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who controls the time on the other side of the House, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who controls the time on this side of the House, are both in favor of the bill. There will be some of us on the floor who are not in favor of this bill, and we would like to know if either one of these distinguished gentlemen would recognize that small coterie of gentlemen here who probably will not favor the passage of the bill. We would like to have some time in which to justify our action before the country in opposing the views of such eminent gentlemen at this particular time—more for self-preservation, probably, than anything else [laughter]; certainly not for any effect it may have at this time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would 45 minutes be sufficient time?

Mr. HOWARD. I should think that if there were not so many of us 45 minutes would be sufficient, but here are seven hours to be devoted to debate upon one side of the question. Some of us have fixed and definite views about this proposition, and I do not think we can present them with such intelligence as we would like to present them to the country in 45 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the fact that seven hours are to be devoted to one side of the question, does not the gentleman think that perhaps it would be unnecessary for his side to say anything?

Mr. HOWARD. That may be true. If I knew the list of gentlemen who are going to participate in debate, I might not want to take any time at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire if this is to be taken as an evidence of our effort to speed up legislation—consuming seven and a half hours of time in general debate on a mere paragraph in a general tariff bill—seven hours to be talked away here about matters that perhaps do not pertain to the bill at all, and then have us kept here into the night perhaps to pass some appropriation bill. This does not look like speeding up to me.

Mr. FORDNEY. This is a very important bill.

Mr. SIMS. We have done nothing but talk free sugar and antifree sugar here for several years.

Mr. MANN. Then we ought to have several hours at this time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Apropos of what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has said, as I understand it free sugar has been one of the time-honored principles of the Democratic Party for a great many years, and I think we ought, at least, to have seven hours of debate if that party is going to repudiate it now.

Mr. SIMS. It has not been a time-honored principle with those who were in the sugar business.

Mr. HOWARD. It at least ought to have respectable funeral services. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I object to seven hours.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to try and make an agreement for some time and if I can not I shall have to object.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will see that the gentleman gets 45 minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. I wanted to know; there are about a dozen of us, but I think we will get some more recruits by to-morrow morning.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we can give the gentleman an hour.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want any time. It will not take me that long to find out that it is all foolishness and folly to consume so much time in general debate, and I object to more than four hours of general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands this is a limitation, not an extension of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know if I can get 10 minutes from each side?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must not try to hold up each side of the House each time we have debate because the gentleman obtained 10 minutes yesterday when nobody else had it.

Mr. LONDON. Yes——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must take his chances with other Members. We have always been fair to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. I know you have.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman propose to devote his time to a discussion of the subject matter of the sugar bill?

Mr. LONDON. I will speak as closely to it, I think, as everybody else on the Republican side.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is about as close as the gentleman gets to any subject.

Mr. LONDON. I will stick closely to the subject.

Mr. BORLAND. Is this debate confined to the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have requests for more time than three and one-half hours will give me on this side.

Mr. LONDON. Well, 5 minutes from the Republican side and 10 minutes from the Democratic side will do.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to make these arrangements privately.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know, but we will try to give the gentleman some time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. I object, Mr. Speaker, to over five hours of general debate.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable. The motion is to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to discuss the bill H. R. 11471.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, pending that will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina move that general debate close at half past 4 to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will. I intended to do that. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Michigan and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks that the time be divided, half and half between himself and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Is there objection to that? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question now is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 11471.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11471, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, this bill simply repeals those clauses in the tariff act of 1913 which provide that on May 1, 1916, the articles enumerated in sections 177 and 178 of the act shall be admitted free of duty. These sections otherwise are not changed, raw sugar still bearing a rate of duty at about 1.25 cents per pound and Cuban sugar, which amounts to over 90 per cent of our imports, with the 20 per cent deduction off, bearing a rate of 1 cent per pound, according to the polariscope test. There has been a great increase in the importation of sugar.

In 1913 the imports on sugar amounted to 4,762,013,956 pounds, valued at $97,129,471, while for the corresponding period of time during the year 1915 there was imported sugar to the United States in the amount of 5,286,218,287 pounds, valued at $179,247,680, an increase in value over 1913 of $82,118,209, while the exports of sugar increased during the same period about $37,000,000.

The tax on sugar is a revenue tax, and sugar is one of the very best revenue-producing articles. During the fiscal year 1915 the duties reached the sum of $49,282,113.17, but there was a drawback of $5,401,173.29. Sugar is one article that when taxed brings in much revenue to the Treasury.

It was believed in 1913, when the tariff law was enacted, that the revenues from customs, income tax, and other internal-revenue taxes would be sufficient to take care of the expenses of the Federal Government and still permit sugar to go upon the free list in 1916. If conditions had remained normal, even with the large decrease in collections from the tax on malt, vinous, and spirituous liquors, these calculations were correct. The Underwood Tariff Act produced more revenue while conditions were normal and up to the breaking out of the great European war than any other act for the same period of time in the history of the Republic.

Even since the Underwood bill became a law and replaced the prohibitive and confiscating rates of the Payne Act it has been the target of constant abuse, attack, and misrepresentation by the Republican Members of this House. With an utter disregard of facts, the Republican leaders and near leaders have repeatedly charged that the Underwood law was a failure as a revenue-producing measure.

The leader of the minority, Mr. MANN; the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FORDNEY; the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LONGWORTH; and the gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, and a number of other Republican Members, all tell us that this act is a failure when it comes to producing revenue. If these gentlemen had spent half as much time, if they had displayed half as much diligence, and expended half as much energy in looking up facts instead of putting in all their time trying to discredit the Underwood Tariff Act and the Democratic Party, I do not believe they would ever have made such extravagant, unwarranted, and unfounded statements as they have been making on the floor of this House.

From January 1, 1914, to August 1, 1914, the only time when the Underwood law had a fair trial, and just before the breaking out of the European war, the Underwood Act produced over $17,000,000 more than the Payne Act for the corresponding months in 1913, and I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan, my good friend, Mr. FORDNEY, that there is no sale of battleships in that statement either. I start with January 1, 1914, because the Underwood Act was not in full operation and effect until that date, and from then to August 1 our revenue act produced $17,426,008.90 more than the Payne Act produced from January 1, 1913, to August 1 of that year. "But you are counting in the receipts from the collection of the income tax," the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and several others told the majority leader [Mr. KITCHIN], when he was making his speech in the House some time ago. Of course we counted in the income tax in 1914 just as you counted in your corporation tax in 1913. They are each incorporated in the tariff acts. You collected nearly $35,000,000 from the corporation tax in 1913, and you counted that.

We did not intend, nor do we want, all the expenses of this Government to be collected at the customhouse, where for every dollar that goes into the Public Treasury three or four or five dollars go into the pockets of private enterprise. We want to take some of the taxes off of poverty and place them on wealth. We want the incomes of this country to pay a proportionate share of the burdens of Government. We gave the American people an honest tariff act, with an honest downward revision, and at the same time provided, under normal and natural conditions, ample revenue to meet the expenses of the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do you understand and do you believe that every dollar of revenue that is placed on an article puts from one to five dollars additional into the pockets of the manufacturer?

Mr. COLLIER. I would not say that every dollar would do it, but I think some would do more than that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And do you believe that that statement is true?

Mr. COLLIER. In reference to some articles.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I wanted to know, and if you believed it was true with reference to agricultural articles.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman asks me if that is true in regard to agricultural articles——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Products.

Mr. COLLIER. I believe the tariff tax on agricultural products is a delusion and a sham. I do not believe it amounts to anything because everything that the farmer raises he has to sell in the markets of the world, and it is no compensation to him to sell his products in the open market of the world and yet have to pay a tax on everything that he buys and needs for his industry. The Democratic Party has always contended that a tax on agricultural products is simply a means of trying to deceive some one. It is by reason of those flimsy excuses that they have been able to hold the farmers of this country to a doctrine of protection whereby millions of dollars every year, by reason of such flimsy excuses as a tax on agricultural products, have been wrung from their pockets by the plundering hand of a tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it is true as to manufactured products, why is it not true as to farm products?

Mr. COLLIER. I want to say another thing to my friend from Michigan. One or two of my friends have just told me, and I have a faint recollection of it now, that one of your most distinguished Members, Senator Dolliver, made a statement similar to the one that I have just made on the floor of the House.

There has been a large increase in importations of those articles which were admitted free of duty, and the decrease is shown on dutiable articles. We expected a decrease in the revenues from dutiable articles, and provided an income tax to furnish the revenue in their stead. This decrease, by reason of the war, was much greater than could have been foreseen in 1913.

For the 12 months ending December, 1913, there was admitted free of duty into the United States imports of the value of $991,850,747, while during the year ending December, 1915, there was admitted free of duty imports of the value of $1,167,428,816, being an increase of free importations in 1915 over 1913 of $175,578,069. The dutiable imports in 1913 reached the value of $800,745,743, as against $611,167,879 dutiable imports in 1915, a difference of $189,745,733 in favor of 1913.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman is informing the House that the duty on farm products is a delusion and a snare. How would he account for more than doubling of the importation of farm products during the two years succeeding the passage of the Underwood law over the two years preceding.

Mr. COLLIER. Doubling of the importations?

Mr. SLOAN. Of the leading farm products of the United States, not including sugar.

Mr. COLLIER. There was a great increase in sugar; yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I say not including; but in the two years preceding the passsage of the Underwood tariff law there was less than half the importation of farm products than there was in the two years succeeding. I want to know if the tariff had something to do with it?

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman wants my candid opinion, I do not believe the tariff on agricultural products has ever amounted to anything and never will except as a good thing perhaps to go before the country with sometimes, as with the claim, as they do in many instances, that the tax on wool is a great benefit to the agricultural interests of the country. I believe the tariff on agricultural products is a delusion and a sham.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEEKER. Will you please explain how it is a delusion and a sham?

Mr. COLLIER. I would like to go on with my statement, but I will give the gentleman the benefit of some little knowledge which I have on that subject.

It is because this is the greatest agricultural country in the world. Suppose we put a tax of $10 or $100 on a bale of cotton. Would that increase the price of that cotton the hundredth part of a cent? No. Why? Because the cotton is raised in this country. We are the great corn-producing country of the world. We are the great wheat-producing country of the world. You do not want to carry coals to Newcastle? We ship out agricultural products. It devolves upon us to feed a great part of the civilized world, and the amount of corn and wheat and other agricultural products that have come in under the tariff that you put on them is so inconsiderable as to be absolutely negligible. I have not got the figures now and I can not yield further on that subject. I have only a half hour, and I have to go on. But the amount, as I say, is absolutely inconsiderable. I will furnish the figures.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert some of these figures in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Just one more question. Are you willing to let that statement go as the standard Democratic explanation of your side of the contention?

Mr. COLLIER. That is my explanation of it. The gentleman can put any other construction on it that he may desire.

The total imports of wheat to the United States for the fiscal year ending June, 1913, were 798,028 bushels, valued at $559,559, while the exports of wheat for the same year amounted to 91,602,974 bushels, valued at $89,036,428.

The total imports of wheat to the United States for the fiscal year ending June, 1915, were 426,469 bushels, valued at $469,847, while the exports of wheat for the same year amounted to 259,642,533 bushels, valued at $333,552,226.

In part proof that the tax on agricultural products is a sham and a pretense, in 1913 under the Payne Act, which carried the highest tariff rate in the history of the Republic, with a tax of 25 cents a bushel on wheat, nearly twice as many bushels of wheat came into the United States as did in 1915 under the Underwood Act, which practically put wheat on the free list and could in no event tax wheat more than 10 cents a bushel. In 1913 there was exported from this country more than one hundred and fifteen times as many bushels of wheat as came into the United States, with a tax of 25 cents a bushel on wheat, while in 1915, when wheat was practically on the free list, we exported over six hundred times as many bushels as came into the United States.

Let us look at the figures of another great agricultural product—oats. The Underwood law reduced the Payne tax on oats from 15 cents to 6 cents a bushel.

In 1913, under the 15-cent tax, 723,899 bushels were brought into the United States. In 1915, under the 6-cent tax, only 630,722 bushels came into the United States. Over 90,000 bushels more of oats came in under the Payne Act in 1913 than were imported in 1915 under the Underwood law.

In 1913 we exported only 33,759,177 bushels of oats, over 46 times as much as came in, while in 1915 we exported 97,169,551 bushels, over 150 times as many bushels as came into the United States.

It is true that in 1915 we imported 9,897,939 bushels of corn, as compared with 903,062 bushels in 1913.

But what a small percentage 9,000,000 bushels of corn is to the annual output of corn, which in 1913 reached the amount of 3,124,746,000 bushels which was produced in the United States, an importation as compared with the production of corn of three-tenths of 1 per cent, while in 1915 we exported about five times as much corn as we imported.

I represent an agricultural district in an agricultural State, but the farmers of Mississippi can not be deceived by a tax on agricultural products. They know that such a tax will not in the hundredth part compensate them for the millions of dollars wrung every year from their pockets by a protective tariff.

I want to say to these gentlemen who are always harping on the tax on agricultural products, despite the unsettled condition of the times, the increased importations of unmanufactured wool is a source of much gratification to us who believe that a tariff on raw wool is the turret arch and foundation stone of protection, because it has been the connecting link which bound together in a common cause the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the United States. When this link is severed the woolen industry will then be out of politics, and the protectionists will lose the support of a few deluded sheep owners who have been clamoring for protection because a tax of 11 cents per pound was placed on raw wool.

When the agricultural interests find that they are no longer connected with protection through the medium of a tax on wool, those farmers who in 1911 raised over $4,500,000,000 worth of cotton, corn, wheat, oats, hay, barley, and potatoes—who were taxed and forced to pay exorbitant and unreasonable prices for all woolen clothing and everything else that they had to buy in order to insure an added profit, none of which, in many instances, ever reached the producer of wool, the value of the entire output of which was not one-sixtieth of the amount of the value of the products I have just referred to—the protective system will become hateful to them. The farmer will of all others be more opposed to a theory of governmental taxation which permits him to sell his products in the open markets of the world but yet compels him to pay a tax on everything he buys for the comfort of his family and for the carrying on of his business.

For the 12 months ending December, 1913, 151,813,703 pounds of unmanufactured wool, of the value of $28,776,274, was imported to the United States; for the same period of time in 1915, 412,721,292 pounds of unmanufactured wool, of the value of $95,042,616, came into the United States free of duty, an increase in the value of this commodity of $66,266,342. This means that in 1915 the output of American woolen factories was increased 260,907,589 pounds, of the value of $66,266,342, over 1913, which increase of nearly three times the amount of the 1913 importation gave additional employment to thousands of our citizens. It means that the American manufacturer has had a better selection of wool than he formerly had when the tariff rate kept out the higher grades, and as a result of this the consumer got better clothing. It also means a cheaper article, because the removal of the duty on raw wool relieved us of the necessity of giving the manufacturers a compensatory tax equal to the tax on his raw material.

And, above all, it means that in 1915 the American people have had $66,000,000 worth of raw wool to be made into clothing and blankets and underwear, nearly 300,000,000 pounds more than they had in 1913. The price of raw wool and the price of woolen clothing is high, but that is due to abnormal and unnatural conditions because of the disturbances in Europe. The price to the consumer of woolen articles may be high, but it is not as high as it would have been on a protective basis, where the demand for these articles would have been as great as it was in 1915 and yet the supply would have been restricted and diminished by nearly 300,000,000 pounds, worth over $66,000,000.

Under the Democratic tariff law the American people in 1915 received $53,000,000 worth of crude, partly and wholly manufactured foodstuffs and food animals, more than they could secure in 1913. If the cost of foodstuffs is high, how much higher would they not have been and how much higher would the cost of living have been if the supply of these articles for food had been cut down $53,000,000?

We were forced to bring in an emergency act because of the decline in the revenue from imports caused by the war. The Mexican situation, inherited from Mr. Taft, also caused us to unexpectedly expend many millions of dollars.

If we do not retain this tax on sugar, we will have to raise the revenue derived from the sugar tax by a direct tax, and, in view of the amount we have to raise to take care of regular expenses and the proposed expense to be incurred for preparations for national defense, we preferred to retain the tax on sugar.

Mr. Chairman, we could not foresee that in less than one year from the enactment of the Underwood tariff law that all of Europe would be in a blaze and that those great countries would meet in the shock of a conflict unparalleled in the world's history. The results of that war have been tremendous throughout Christendom. Continental business was at a standstill. International competition was destroyed and importations to the United States were either discontinued and diminished or else their character was so changed that they materially affected the revenues from customs duties and we were forced to bring in an emergency act.

Yet these same gentlemen tell us that the war in Europe is and was in no degree responsible for the falling off and decline in customs receipts. It is hard to realize that such a proposition can be seriously debated in this House.

We know that thousands of factories have either been closed or destroyed, and that millions of men have been drawn from these factories and have entered the different armies of Europe. We know that unhappy Belgium, another "Niobe of nations, childless and almost crownless in her voiceless woe," we know that Belgium, two years ago a busy scene of happiness, prosperity, and commercial industry, is now a ruined, blackened, and desolate waste.

We know that in sunny France the sharp rattle of the machine gun has replaced the busy humming of countless spindles, and where once rolled the smoke from many factories the air now is darkened with a deadly hail of shot and shell.

We know that Germany, imperial Germany, one of the greatest export countries of all Europe, is an armed camp and her exports shut off from passage of the seas by an allied fleet.

We know that Austria has millions of men engaged in the conflict, and that her factories as well as those of her great ally are working night and day, not to manufacture articles for export, but to turn out munitions of war and death-dealing missiles of destruction.

We know that England, proud mistress of the seas, is conscripting her men from the factories and sending them by millions into the ranks.

We know that Russia, with her immense territory and tremendous resources, is engaged not in commercial enterprise, but in hurling countless thousands against the gray wall of Teutonic steel which extends for hundreds of miles.

We know that Italy has no time to participate in the peaceful pursuits of commercial life, but is concentrating all her resources to prosecute the war.

We know that Serbia lies naked at the invaders' feet. We know that Montenegro is prostrate, Bulgaria exhausted, and that Greece is blockaded. We know that submarines have destroyed hundreds of merchant vessels, and that international commerce has been throttled and strangled in a thousand ways, and yet, these gentlemen, these Republican leaders, solemnly declare that the war in Europe is not responsible for the decline in our revenues.

Let us look into the facts. Let us compare the imports of 1915 with those of 1913, when there was no war. You Republicans tell us that the lowering of the tariff rates will ruin American manufactories, because we will be swamped with importations which will flood the country, destroy competition, cheapen prices, and drive our labor out of employment. We reduced the tariff rates on practically every article and commodity in everyday use. To make your argument good, if the war in Europe has nothing to do with the decrease in revenues from importations, then the imports of 1915 should show a large increase over 1913, when we were operating under the highest tariff rate in the history of the Republic. If there is any logic at all in your position, you are bound to admit this proposition. But let us look at the facts. For the 12 months ending in December, 1913, the total importations from Europe amounted to $864,666,103, and for the corresponding months of 1915, during the war, these importations amounted to $546,352,567, a loss of $318,313,536 worth of imports.

And these Republican leaders still insist that the war in Europe was not responsible for the decline in our revenues and that we were forced to pass the emergency act because the Underwood tariff law was a failure.

We were forced to pass the emergency act and we were forced to continue this act in both instances through no fault of our own. We expect to bring in a revenue bill later on which will take care of a situation not of our making, and for the purpose of meeting necessary expenditures in preparation for national defense.

The American people are willing to be taxed and contribute of their means for purposes of national defense. The great masses of those people, irrespective of party affiliations, are behind the President of the United States, who, serene, confident, standing at the helm, has safely steered our ship of state through the seething, boiling waters of turmoil and strife which seem to have engulfed the rest of the world. [Applause.]

As much as we all love peace and deplore war, as much as we are desirous of living on good terms with our neighboring countries, as much as we all are opposed to the establishing of a great military power in the United States, yet, remembering that new occasions teach new duties, we must exercise common sense and look at the situation which confronts us with American eyes. Over half a billion Christian people are at each other's throats engaged in war. The world is war mad. The rights of neutrals may be little regarded; certainly, not at all if powerful interest points the other way. A treaty is worth little more than the parchment upon which it is written. Unarmed merchant vessels have been destroyed without warning. One by one other nations have been forced into the conflict. God forbid that we shall ever be drawn into this war. The wisdom and prudence of President Wilson has kept us out so far, and I voice the earnest prayer of all patriotic Americans that we devoutly hope we will continue to keep out of this war. But no man knows what a day may bring forth. I am as much opposed to the militant spirit which prevails in certain portions of Europe as I am to the pacific spirit which has made China, with her 400,000,000 people, a national football to be kicked about at will by the countries of the world.

I do not believe in useless extravagance. My votes in this House during the past seven years I have been a Member of this body have been a protest against the waste of the taxpayers' money. I would not vote one cent for the aggrandizement and territorial expansion of our country. I would not vote one dollar for preparations for a foreign invasion for conquest; but I do believe that our country should be so prepared and so equipped that we would be ready at all times to defend our honor and protect our homes. [Applause.] We should be prepared to defend our great coast line against any kind of an invasion and maintain with dignity and honor the official acts and mandates of the Republic. We should be prepared to preserve in the letter and the spirit that doctrine which guarantees the territorial sovereignty of our South and Central American Republics, and thunders to Czar and Kaiser and King: "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther."

I repeat that I am opposed to extravagance and useless public expenditures; but when it comes to a matter touching the defense of our country—our country, with its proud history, its noble traditions, its free institutions, its liberal Government—when it comes to the defense of our country, the protection of our firesides, and the preservation of those institutions so dear to all lovers of human liberty, the retention and preservation of these blessings can not be weighed in the sordid balance of the dollars and cents they may cost to preserve [applause]; nor do I believe that the American people will be deterred from expecting us to do our duty here because some may profit through the expense of preparation.

I believe that preparation for defense means a preservation of peace. No one doubts the courage and bravery of the American people. The spirit of our Revolutionary fathers, who resolved to be free or fill martyrs' graves, finds lodgment in the breasts of our people to-day. Since that memorable Fourth of July when "equality with sword uplifted above the cradle of an infant Republic" consecrated that sword to the imperishable doctrine that "freedom is the heritage of mankind" our country has been foremost among the nations of the earth. The blood of the patriot who fell at Bunker Hill, which flowed at New Orleans, which drenched the plains of Buena Vista, and which ran in rivers at Gettysburg is no more red than that which courses through the veins of her sons to-day.

If armed invasion should place its mailed heel upon our shores, from every section of a reunited country an indignant and outraged citizenship, rallying around that flag, with undaunted bravery and deathless courage would hurl themselves upon the invader.

There would be patriotism enough, there would be bravery enough, there would be heroism enough. Whether our country was prepared or not, no one could ever discount the valor, the courage, and the undaunted spirit of our people.

But if the countries of the world know that back of that patriotism, that courage, that heroism, and that undaunted spirit there is, with the proper and needed equipment, an intelligent preparation for defense, shall it be said that it is the optimist only who can predict for us a lasting peace with all mankind?

I am often asked the questions: "What do you mean by preparedness? What do you want for preparedness?" I am not an engineer. I am no naval expert. I do not know what kind of guns should be on the forward turret of a battleship, nor do I know how thick the armor plate on a dreadnaught should be, but I do know that the captain of the ship, the President of the United States, who by reason of his position secures information through a hundred channels and derives knowledge through numberless avenues that are denied and closed to us, tells us that by reason of the knowledge he has secured and the information he has received, that we should take steps for our country's defense. I do know that we should stand by him and do all that is necessary for the safety of the Republic.

These preparations for our national defense are going to cost money, and it devolves upon the Ways and Means Committee of this House to bring in a revenue bill to take care of this situation and to meet these necessary expenses. It has been said that our Republican friends will vote for preparedness, but will vote against a revenue bill which raises the money to meet the expenses they themselves have helped us to incur.

The Speaker of the House and the minority leader have shaken hands across the aisle and have declared that preparedness is nonpartisan. Time will disclose whether providing the means to take care of the necessary money to carry out the ideas of our national defense is also nonpartisan.

I hold no brief to speak for the Ways and Means Committee as to what kind of a bill will be brought in here to take care of these expenses; but, speaking for myself, I believe that munitions of war and incomes should bear the greater burden of this tax. [Applause.] There are many reasons why this should be.

The chaotic conditions in Europe are largely responsible for the necessity of our making preparations for our defense.

Events of tremendous international importance are happening almost daily, and no one can tell what complications may arise as the result of any one of these events.

The necessity of our taking immediate steps for national defense arose through no fault of ours, but because of conditions elsewhere. The owners of these plants which are now supplying munitions of war to the belligerents of Europe are reaping a richer harvest and are securing greater dividends than two years ago they ever dreamed of. I am told that some of these great manufacturing establishments are making profits of hundreds of thousands of dollars a day. Whether that is true or not, I do not know, but I do know they are securing more financial benefit out of the war in Europe than any class of manufacturing industry. If we are put to greater expense by reason of a condition that enables these industries to increase their profits a thousandfold, then it is only right that they should pay a large proportion of the expense which we have incurred. In the preparations for defense here at home these same industries will again reap a greater profit than any other class of American industry, and that is still another reason why they should materially help pay the cost of preparation.

Great Britain, France, and Germany are now taxing munitions of war, so there is nothing new in the proposition. Incomes should also bear a heavy part of this expense. An income tax is a just tax; it is no tax on prosperity, no interdict on wealth, no embargo on industry, no prohibition on thrift, but an honest tax, where every man contributes to the Government's support according to his ability to pay and according to the protection he receives from that Government. The total national income was estimated in 1910 at the sum of $30,500,000,000. The following table shows that much of this wealth is in the hands of a few:

Members of families.	Family income.	Total income.
261	$200,000 to $1,000,000	$126,000,000
98	$1,000,000 to $2,000,000	136,000,000
41	$2,000,000 to $5,000,000	118,000,000
10	$5,000,000 to $10,000,000	79,000,000
5	$10,000,000 to $50,000,000	158,000,000

There are 60 people in the United States whose net incomes are more than $1,000,000 each. Under the old Republican system of taxation of three years ago, these 60 people paid no income tax, but paid only on what they ate and what they wore. Paying taxes only on what is eaten for food and worn for clothing, it is possible and probable that a machinist, with a large family, working for barely a living wage, actually paid more taxes to support the Federal Government than some of the multimillionaires with a small family and whose daily income is over $2,800.

Income-tax payers are therefore not only in a condition to pay, but in case of war they have more property to protect than those of their less-favored neighbors. They have great interest at stake, because if an indemnity should be required of any city those of larger means would be called upon at once to contribute. In case preparations for defense should be the means of preserving peace, then the interest of these taxpayers has increased, because during the interval of peace their business and their industries have not been disturbed and they have secured greater income and larger profits than those who are not so fortunate as to come within the provisions of this tax. There is still another reason. While I do not intend to reflect upon either the courage or the patriotism of the income-tax payers, yet if war should be declared, they would constitute an inconsiderable proportion of those actually engaged in the conflict. The fighting would be done by those whose business interests are of such a character that they do not receive incomes in excess of $3,000 a year. A considerable number of these vast fortunes are the direct result of benefits received from the Federal Government through favored and special legislation.

If those less favored by commercial prosperity offer their lives in their country's defense, those who have in the past received benefits and protection from that Government to build up their colossal fortunes should at least offer their means to the defense of their country.

Mr. Chairman, my time is nearly out, so I must hasten to a close. We are going to retain this tax on sugar because conditions we could not foresee arose and made it necessary that we should retain the revenue derived from the importations of that article or else raise the amount by a direct tax. The Republican Members of this House will again rail at us and charge that we have broken faith. They will again affirm that the Underwood Tariff Act is not a revenue-producing law. They will again predict that next November the American people will retire us and put them in our place.

I would like for my Republican friends [applause on the Republican side]—ah, gentlemen, that applause came a little late, and after November it is going to be a little later than that. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to ask you what promises are you going to make to the American people to induce them to be so unwise and so foolish as to restore you to that power you once had, and which you so shamelessly abused? After 50 years of control you were weighed in the balance and found wanting. What are you going to promise then? Are you going to tell them that you will repeal the Underwood Tariff Act? [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!" on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER (on the Republican side). And we will do it, too!

Mr. COLLIER. Are you going to promise them that you will put in its place the prohibitive, the confiscating rates of the Payne law? After that law had been in operation for two years a Republican would run from the defense of it and from the word "standpat" as we used to run from a yellow-fever patient. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. In just a moment. I understand, from what I have heard from my friends on the other side, that you are going to promise the people to return to the indefensible rates on wool, which were 200 or 300 per cent in the Payne law. Some one asked me if I were stating the Democratic position. I want to ask you if I am stating the Republican position on wool?

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. You ask us if we will promise; we will keep the things that we do promise. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COLLIER. Your whole system has been marked by misuse and founded on deception. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman lives long enough, he will see what we do do.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I love life as much as anyone, and I hope people will not say that I am too enamored with life when I say that I hope I will be living when the Republicans come back into power. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. So say we, all of us; and that is the hope of the whole country. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COLLIER. However, before that happens I shall live long enough to be older than Methuselah. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Are you going to promise the people to repeal the provisions of the income tax and again permit the wealth of the country to escape the payment of its share of the burdens of Government?

Are you going to promise the people that you will repeal the national reserve act and return once more to the useless, antiquated financial system you so often promised you would change?

Are you going to promise the people that you will repeal the trust laws and permit the directorates of a few institutions to corner the markets and control the credit of the United States?

Are you going to promise the people that you are going to repeal the Trade Commission act?

Are you going to promise the people that you are going to return to standpattism and the old system of Government spoliation and robbery of all the people to enrich a few whose campaign contributions have restored you to power?

How much of the Democratic program, how many of these Democratic policies are you going to promise the people you will repeal?

I know that you would like to see all of these measures repealed, but there is none of you on that side who has the courage and bravery to advocate their repeal, because you know that these laws are a crystallized expression of years of longing by the American people—laws that you so often promised and so shamelessly denied. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The camp followers backed by the money interests of those who profit by Republican administration, the spoilsmen who grew rich by your unjust discrimination and unpardonable partiality; those who are seeking privileges and are yearning for the flesh pots of the old system of governmental exploitation; they are those who criticize the Democratic Party and invoke the spirit of repudiated Republicanism.

But the Democratic Party, born in the early days of the Republic, founded upon the bedrock principles of equal rights for all and special privileges to none, is undismayed by the same old attacks coming from such a source, and secure in the consciousness of its own rectitude, presents an impregnable front to all enemies of good government and fair legislation.

With the greatest President since the days of Andrew Jackson guarding the destinies of the Republic, the great masses of the people of the United States have placed their trust and their hope in Woodrow Wilson, and vain is the ambition and useless the effort of those who seek to hurl him from that place he has so justly earned in the hearts and the minds and the confidence of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONGRESS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the power to condense thought into phrases that will linger is a gift. It has been indulged in by Presidents, and by those who are capable of being Presidents, and has served them well in numerous campaigns. Amongst the modern phrase makers the President of the United States is a shining exemplar. The Speaker of the House of Representatives has also attained an enviable distinction in this regard. At Philadelphia on Saturday night the Speaker added materially to the fame he has already achieved. On being approached for an interview upon the Presidency the great Missourian is reported to have said:

"President Wilson has the world by the tail." [Laughter.]

Coming with that magniminity which has hitherto characterized this eminent authority upon matters presidential, the utterance of our distinguished colleague, if accurately reported, was interpreted to mean substantially this:

"The President has kicked over the one-term pail set up at Baltimore and is going back for a second."

In the midst of the great war in Europe, provoking as it has been to the economic ends of the administration, and with troubles along the Mexican border, it may by some be deemed indelicate for a Republican to discuss now the presidential situation of 1916; but unfortunately there is no "watchful waiting" in the Constitution of the United States. That great palladium of our liberties brooks no delay in so important a matter as the election of a President. Moreover, the tariff question is looming up, the sugar repealer is here, the financial exigencies of the Nation are urgent, and the election is due in November. The issue as to who shall govern our great country must be discussed sooner or later, despite the waves of patriotism that spasmodically sweep the country as "the sparks begin to fly."

It was generous of the gentleman from Missouri, therefore, as it was timely, to throw his life buoy on the troubled sea of Democracy in the impending political crisis. To have it known now that "the President has the world by the tail" is at once a challenge and a warning. It is enigmatic, however, in that Republicans are not informed as to the true meaning of "the tail of the world." Generally speaking, the term is nebulous and would mean no votes. It is too indefinite for practical politicians. The Speaker may have meant that the President had in his grasp "the tail of Villa" and his Mexican marauders. Then the patient public would understand that politics had at last been subordinated to action. [Applause on the Republican side.] Or if the true meaning of so new and forceful a phrase related to "the tail of the industrial world," which the President so vigorously twisted when he set "American wits" to "contest with the wits of the world," the wage earners of the country would understand the application of it. We must accept one or the other of these inferences or be forced to the conclusion, which is unthinkable of the Speaker, that due to love of native State and the chiefest of her products, his deliverance referred to "the tail" which is generally found at the business end of the Missouri mule. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Such an interpretation of that which is apochryphal in his new and enduring sentiment is believable only upon the ground that "every kick is a boost." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now approach the sugar schedule from another angle. There is reason to believe the President may come to Congress to seek its cooperation in the Mexican trouble. If the raid of Villa was connived at by designing Americans or by Mexican revolutionists, if it involves American intervention, or if it means the acquisition of new territory and the setting up of new States, he ought to consult Congress, even with more directness than he exercised under his constitutional prerogative in the recent controversy over armed merchantmen. If the President does come to Congress with any of these important international problems, his recommendations should be carefully considered, and promptly supported if such problems are shown to threaten the national peace or honor. If Members of Congress are not to be consulted with respect to such problems as involve the people in war and taxes, it may well be charged that the Congress is not exercising its functions as delegated by the Constitution. To say a discussion of such matters by Congress is to embarrass the President is beside the question. The duties of Congress are clearly defined.

It is certainly with no intention of embarrassing the President, therefore, that in discussing the sugar repealer I may refer to some matters of domestic concern, including the many changes of front that have characterized the administration and which have made the platform of the Democratic Party a mockery and a byword. I am interested in the peace and prosperity of the people of the United States more than I am in the welfare of the people of any other nation, and I do not wish, as a Representative, to be swept from the path of political rectitude because, after years of domestic and industrial disturbance, provoked by the present administration, and against which the Republican Party protested, the slothful policy of "watchful waiting" in Mexico is to be changed to action, only, however, as it becomes necessary to repel an actual invasion of our soil.

Under the circumstances as they have been reported to us from the Mexican border, President Wilson, as a primary move, was justified in sending troops against Villa, but it does not detract from the credit due him for what he has done to say that no President, Democrat or Republican, could have done less.

THE M'LEMORE RESOLUTION.

In the controversy over the so-called McLemore resolution, though a public sentiment was well worked up over it, there was no such partisanship as indicated at any time a lack of congressional willingness to cooperate with the President. The President's purpose was not clear. He was reported as seeking the burial of the McLemore resolution and shortly thereafter of wishing it reported out. He spoke to Congress only by indirection, and the McLemore resolution was so reported as not to be considered by the House. The whole proceeding was irregular and misleading. It meant nothing in the end but the tabling of a resolution which nobody wanted. Those who wished to spare themselves the criticism of being disloyal voted to table the resolution without consideration, because they were induced to think the honor of the Nation was at stake. Those who sought to act upon the merits of the proposition, and who were not permitted to do so under the rule, which was unnecessary, voted against the tabling in order that the resolution which had disturbed the President might be considered and amended or defeated, as the facts should warrant. The confusion into which the Congress was thrown was devoid of substantial information from the White House, and the parliamentary trick, which tended to discredit an entire body of the people's representatives, was as palpable as it was gratuitous. It is to be hoped, therefore, that any future support which the President seeks to obtain from Congress upon any problem vital to the people may be had under less perplexing and unfriendly circumstances. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE MEXICAN SITUATION.

The reading public was sadly confused about the armed merchantmen affair. In due course that public will know whether Congress was fairly treated, just as some day it may be known whether "a man of straw" was suddenly set up in the House of Representatives for selfish or political purposes. With the Mexican affair it is different. For three long years the American public has chafed and fretted over the Mexican situation. It knew that conceded rights to Americans in Mexico were violated; it knew American life had been taken and American property seized and destroyed. The public knew that the flag of the United States was insulted in Mexico, and that although the Congress voted to support the President in his war upon Huerta, no distinguished honor accrued to our country by reason of that war. The public knew that "watchful waiting" involved the humiliation of Americans; that they were warned by their own Government to leave Mexico regardless of any rights they may have had to the protection of their flag. The great reading public was well informed as to all this, and marveled at it. It was only when the raider, Villa, crossed the American border and attacked the city of Columbus that they were apprised of the purpose of the administration to proceed to the serious business of upholding the national honor and maintaining domestic peace.

OUR REVENUE PROBLEMS.

Important as it is to have an understanding as to what the administration desires in grave international crises, it is equally important that the ways and means by which these crises are to be met shall not be overlooked. Let us give to the President all the support he asks when the honor or safety of the Republic are in the balance, but in our excitement as patriots let us not forget that the people whom we represent must pay for the economic failures of an administration just as they will have to pay for any wars into which our country may be plunged.

The bill before us illustrates the thought in mind. While the Ways and Means Committee does not admit it in so many words, this bill to repeal the free-sugar provisos of the Underwood tariff law is a confession of the inadequacy of Democratic policy to raise funds to run the Government. It is proposed by this bill to hold on to approximately $45,000,000 which the Democratic Party proposed by law to take away from the Federal Treasury and turn over to the importers of sugar. If it be treason to direct attention to this direct reversal of the Democratic platform, Republicans who undertake to do so must accept the consequences. Their constituents are entitled to know the facts.

Nor is it unreasonable at this time, when the agitation of European and Mexican affairs is diverting attention from the debts and extravagancies of the present administration, that some one should arise with courage enough to put the blame for our domestic troubles exactly where it belongs. It is easy to remember that before the advent of the present administration the United States was aglow with the fires of industry in ordinary legitimate pursuits. It was not the industry born of the horrible business of making munitions to destroy the lives of our brethren across the seas. The United States Treasury was in ample funds and the country was at peace with the world. All this changed when President Wilson took the reins of office. It is not an exaggeration of the facts to say that the three years of his administration have consisted chiefly of vain efforts to prove the unprovable in practical and in political economy.

TAXES AND CONFUSION OF LAWS.

If the administration has not made good in our domestic affairs, why should Republicans encourage a continuance of it because of confusion in our foreign affairs? The facts as to Democratic incompetency are still before us. Neither should it be forgotten that in the effort to prove up the impracticable the administration has so involved this country in a plethora of ambiguous and oppressive laws that it may require the best statesmanship of a generation to release legitimate business from its unwelcome entanglements.

The President is the leader and spokesman of his party. For such damage as has been done to the people of the United States in the attempt to enforce the economic policies of the Democratic Party he has no apology or excuses to offer. In his revenue message to Congress he spoke of the deficit that existed and that must increase, until now it is approximated at more than $360,000,000 for the year 1917.

PRESIDENT IS NOT NONPARTISAN.

The only reason given for this astonishing condition of the Treasury, income taxes and war taxes included, is the incident of the European war. The President does not appoint any Republican to office, though commissions have been created with the understanding that they were to be nonpartisan; neither does the President admit the culpability of the Democratic Party for any of his troubles or for those of the Nation. Like the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee on Ways and Means he lays the blame to the European war. If at any time during the last three years Republicans could be criticized for criticizing the administration, the administration can not be credited with having gone out of its way to lead Republicans to believe that they had had "any new ideas in 30 years." It may be set down as a sure thing that even though Republicans may "stand by the President" in any international crisis now, they will do so as patriots, since kind words from the administration will not be "coronets in the crown" of any Republican who may seek in the campaign of 1916 to restore the Republican system of protection for the existing order of debt and taxes.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman called attention to the fact that the President had said that the Republican Party had not had a new idea for 30 years; is it not a fact that we generally adhere to our ideas?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; if we find them to be right; and we usually do.

NO PROMISE FOR THE FUTURE.

In the bill now under consideration (H. R. 11471) to repeal the free-trade sugar provisos there is no assurance that the protection which the committee has resorted to for expediency's sake will work a change of heart on the general question of protection and free trade. The administration needs the $45,000,000, and it jumps from free trade to protection in order to cinch the money before it slips back into the pockets of the importers. It makes this bold flop only because of the European war—the same excuse that was presented by the committee when compelled to continue the $100,000,000 war tax. There is no promise of a permanent change. Having spent the people's tax money, the committee blandly asks for more.

Observe how easily the committee upsets the Baltimore platform. Note the directness with which the Gordian knot of party consistency is severed. On the theory that "'twere well it were done quickly," the committee says:

Had the normal conditions existing at the time of the passage of the act of October 3, 1913, not been disturbed by the European war, it would not have been necessary to continue the present rates of duty on sugar after May 1, 1916.

A careful reading of these lines shows the intensity of feeling which our Democratic brethren have against the European war. It was not a fatuous and mistaken economic policy that did the revenue trick; it was the infernal war in Europe. In the same report, in the next paragraph, the same sad song of the European war is sung. It grates on the ear, but we are impelled to repeat it:

This legislation is made necessary in order that the Treasury may have the benefit of the revenue receipts from sugar in meeting the decline in customs and postal receipts due to the disturbed conditions resulting from the European war, and also to assist in meeting the decline in ordinary internal-revenue receipts.

No word of atonement for the ills we have suffered! No word of regret for the damage that was done. The Democratic Treasury needs the money, and that is all there is to it. The money is not to send troops after the bandits in Mexico; it will not help in our general preparations for war. It is just ordinary, everyday money that is needed to meet the current expenses of the Government. More than that, it is Republican protection money which the Democrats, who now take it, first spurned, even though in the spurning they threatened to destroy the beet-sugar industry of the United States and to bury the Louisiana sugar planters under the ground.

The long and short of it, in the simplest language we can conjure up, is simply this:

The Baltimore platform was a platform of "principles," when the Democratic Party was fooling the voters, but it is a "scrap of paper" when they need the money.

A SUGARY DISH OF CROW.

The facts are so plain that no Republican can be deceived. Our Democratic brethren may contend for "principle," but they do not forsake the cash. Their performance on the sugar schedule is the "proof of the pudding." The dish of crow is before them, served up from their own kitchen. It is no time for Republicans to submerge themselves under the altar of self-denial. They have a right to be seen and heard and crow a little if they want to. The Democratic handbook of 1912, "thanked God for Wilson." Its inspired chapter upon the free sugar the consumers were to get at a reduced cost was very seductive. The advantages which the Government was to derive were happily portrayed by the Democratic orators. It is not for Republicans now to so concern themselves with the troubles of the administration, as to forget that the price of sugar to the consumer did not come down. We ought to remember the facts and, knowing the facts, proclaim them.

NOT FINANCIALLY PREPARED.

Mr. Chairman, it takes a long while in times of political excitement to make the people understand, but they can not fail to appreciate the wealth of buncombe that was served up to them when they unduly agitated themselves, in the interest of the sugar importers, for the removal of a duty which cost them nothing and which their Government sorely needed. Even the Democrats, who promoted the agitation, are compelled to admit the facts.

There is another point to which I would direct the attention of the House. The administration, which is sick financially, in spite of the taxes it has imposed in times of peace, is not prepared for the expenses of war. It was not prepared when it thrust the armed-merchantmen controversy upon the House, and it would be less prepared for a European or an Asiatic conflict, if the trouble in Mexico results in intervention. Its defensive effectiveness along our coasts would be further reduced if it were compelled to defend an assault at Panama. What provision has the administration made for all this preparedness? If the Treasury is depleted and deficits stare us in the face, in what condition will we find ourselves if any of these foreign contingencies become a reality? The President has advanced but a single thought—the taxing of gasoline, of steam engines, of incomes, and the like. Even so, who is to pay when the ordinary resources of the Government fail?

THE PEOPLE MUST PAY.

The answer is plain; the people must pay. It is reported that the President is opposed to an issue of bonds; there is no other way out except to increase the taxes levied directly upon the people. The resort to such protection measures as the free-sugar repealer is only an expedient to meet an emergency. The differences between the President and his party and the Republican system of protection are too great to admit of the acceptance by this administration of the Republican platform. The Republican Party, seeking to extend American trade, believes in the development of home industries. The President and his party believe in reducing the industries of the United States to the foreign level. No war in Europe nor any outbreak in Mexico nor any raising of the national-honor standard above the grim ogre of national debt, will suffice to divert the American wage earner from the meaning of this. The men who toil in the mills and on the farms of the United States are the men upon whom the burden ultimately falls. They know the difference between the working conditions in European countries and those that prevail in the United States. Republicans can meet the President and his party upon this issue, and they should not hesitate to do it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

REPUBLICANS SHOULD BE ON GUARD.

If, therefore, the experimentation of the Democratic theorists has been unsuccessful, if "the captain of the team" has failed to retain the full confidence of his players, if the man at the helm who took the ship from its Republican moorings and lost his course in a sea of trouble, if the rich heritage of a prosperous administration has been wasted by the profligate and the prodigal, why should Republicans worry? Of course, we should sustain the national honor; of course, we should keep Old Glory nailed to the mast; of course, in an international crisis we should "stand by the President," but does all this mean that we shall kiss the hand that smites us? Is there not some politics in all this patriotic sentimentality? Have we no candidates of our own, no platform, no policies, no record for patriotism or for good government? Perhaps it may embarrass our international negotiations to refer to the history of the great Republican Party and all that it has stood for. For one I do not believe it. I do not believe the President believes it. Why, then, should Republicans be stampeded into the belief that the glory and perpetuity of the Nation are dependent upon Democratic success in November? Let us recall the immortal words of our distinguished Speaker, "President Wilson has the world by the tail."

Mark you, it is not the international world, but the political world to which the Speaker refers. Has it embarrassed our international negotiations for one great Democrat to thus predict the reelection of a Democratic President? Let us see what another leader of Democracy has to say upon this subject. Vice President Marshall leaving the White House on Monday last, informed the newspapers that "President Wilson is going to be elected again, and we are going to carry Indiana for him."

Is this intrusion of a political germ into the patriotic serenity of the White House a violation of international law? We may safely leave it to the tolerant and overburdened taxpayers of the country to answer.

Mr. Chairman, this is no time for Republicans to be following strange gods. Facing the stern necessities of the Nation, Republicans should stand by their own guns, nor permit themselves to be shifted from the moorings that have been proven to be safe and sound. Never in the history of the country have the plain people needed their services more than they do now, or will in the trying times to come. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the first year of the Underwood tariff law lost fifteen millions to the Treasury on the sugar schedule, increased the price 2½ cents a pound to the consumer, and added $10,000,000 to the profits of the Sugar Trust.

Many Democrats seem to assume, as also do many citizens who are independent of party affiliations, that the Republican campaign of 1916 will consist almost entirely of exposure of the mistakes and inefficiency of the Democratic administration. Such is not the case. It is true that we shall be called upon frequently to disclose the injurious legislation and the maladministration of the Democratic Party. This is made necessary by the fact that the head of this administration abandoned his announced policy of "pitiless publicity" and made secrecy one of his cardinal virtues. Since the American people have no other means of learning the true story of the destructive results of this administration, we Republicans shall make known all the facts we can discover.

The chief part of our argument, however, will be that by years of successful management of governmental affairs the Republican Party has demonstrated its constructive policies and that the people of the United States, by reason of that demonstration, can reasonably place confidence in the fulfillment of the promises the Republican Party shall make in its next platform.

It is hardly necessary to recount the achievements of this Nation while under Republican control.

We maintained a sound system of finance, and when the development of the country required an extension thereof we devised a reserve banking system which would meet the needs of changing conditions. Some of the provisions of that plan were incorporated in what is now known as the Federal reserve banking act, the most important features of which were written in by Republican Members of Congress.

The readiness of the Republican Party to enact legislation for which there is a real need was demonstrated in the enactment of the postal savings bank act, which passed this House with the support of Republican votes and with every negative vote cast by a Democrat. It passed the upper House of Congress by the votes of Republicans, with a single exception.

The Republican Party never hesitates at a large undertaking, as witness our enactment of a measure providing for the construction of the Panama Canal. It is a matter of common knowledge on the other side of the House, as well as on this, that under Republican administration the financial condition of the Government was such that the canal was constructed chiefly from current revenue and with a very small sale of the authorized bonds. I do not undertake to say that the Panama Canal was a party measure. It had the support of many Democrats and the opposition of some Republicans; but I do assert that Republican economic policies made it practicable for the United States to enter upon so large and so extensive an undertaking.

Another piece of constructive legislation for which the Republican Party may justly claim credit is the parcel post. It will be remembered by men who are now upon this floor that in 1912, when the House of Representatives was controlled by the Democratic Party, that party refused to place in the Post Office appropriation bill a provision for the establishment of a general parcel-post service, but merely authorized a parcel-post service on rural routes only and provided for the appointment of a committee to study the question. A Republican Senate rejected that provision and substituted for it the basic principles of the parcel post as it was enacted into law. Lest I be accused of some unfairness, permit me to say that some of the features of that measure were written into it while the bill was in conference by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who then was and still is the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

There is another feature of Republican constructive legislation little known to the people of the Eastern States, although, I think, fully appreciated by Members of this body from whatever section of the country they may come, namely, the establishment of our reclamation work. Since the enactment of the first reclamation law in 1902 we have constructed in the arid regions irrigation works which have cost $100,000,000 and which have placed 945,000 acres of hitherto unproductive land under a state of cultivation, and have appropriated water sufficient ultimately to irrigate 3,000,000 acres of land. We have increased the value of this land from practically nothing to a present average value of $100 per acre. Henceforth that land, which was previously given up to the coyote and jack rabbit, will yield crops which have an annual value of $25 per acre and will afford comfortable homes for 60,000 families. Those newly created homes in what was formerly a wilderness provide new and ready markets for the manufactures and other products of other sections of the country.

When the Republican Party was in power it enacted the interstate-commerce law, which protects shippers against exorbitant charges and, by prohibiting rebates, guards against ruinous discriminations. We established the Bureau of Labor and later the Department of Labor and created the Bureau of Mines. We placed upon the statute books laws which required the use of safety devices on railroads. The Republican Party enacted the pure-food law, which guards not only the health, but the private business of the American people. We submitted to the American people the constitutional amendment providing for popular election of United States Senators. We brought the Postal Service to the highest standard in its history, a standard from which it has fallen during the present régime.

That long list comprises but a few of the many constructive achievements of Republican administrations for the promotion of the welfare of the United States as a Nation and for the prosperity and happiness of the American people as an industrial commonwealth. It is a pleasing picture upon which to gaze. It is a record of which the Nation is proud. It is a page unequaled in the history of the world.

With great regret, therefore, I feel impelled by a sense of duty to turn from agreeable recollections of those years of progress and well-earned prosperity and direct attention to the mischievous and destructive effects of an ill-advised administration of our Government affairs. Unpleasant though the task may be, I feel that for the guidance of our future conduct we should take cognizance of the mistakes of the past in order that we may correct our errors and avoid repetitions. I approach the performance of this duty with the utmost personal good feeling toward all those who have been responsible for our national blunders, one of the greatest of which was the enactment of the Underwood Tariff Act.

It is not through any feeling of animosity or antagonism toward the Democrats or the Democratic Party that we Republicans suggest and urge a revision of the Democratic tariff law. On the contrary, our attitude toward them is most kindly and beneficent. It is our desire that they, along with us, shall enjoy the beneficial effects of a protective tariff policy. Along with them we have suffered the results of a tariff for revenue only, constituting, as it does, a tariff that is 70 per cent free trade. The American business man who has enlisted under the banner of Democracy has sustained exactly the same losses, endured the same uncertainties, and suffered the same mental anxiety that we Republicans have for nearly three years.

With the exception that one industry of the South has to some extent an interest slightly different from that of the North, we are one people and similarly affected by economic legislation. Even in the South business men are now coming to believe that a protective tariff policy is necessary for the promotion of their industrial and commercial prosperity. The tariff is no longer a local issue—it ought not be a partisan issue, for Republicans and Democrats are benefited in exactly the same manner by a protective tariff and are similarly injured by its repeal and the substitution of the principle of free trade.

It is not, therefore, from purely selfish motives that we propose the repeal of what is known as the Underwood-Simmons tariff law, nor would we, if we could, enact a measure which would be beneficial to Republicans alone. Our Democratic friends are neighbors of ours at home; they are congenial colleagues on this floor; they are patriotic American citizens who respond to every call their country may make upon them. They may err in judgment, but their hearts are true. Far be it from us, therefore, to write into any statute a single line that would affect them adversely. Prompted by the sincerest desire to promote their welfare, we propose a return to the protective-tariff policy.

It may be readily admitted that as a theory of world-wide business relations, free trade is attractive. But in the face of experience the reasoning man is compelled to accept the demonstrations of practice where they conflict with the teachings of theory, and in this we are not guided alone by the experience of our own country. We have before us not only our own experience from 1893 to 1897 and from 1913 to the outbreak of the European war in 1914, but there is also open to the careful student of this question the experience of the German Empire, under a free-trade policy from 1865 to 1879 and under a protective-tariff policy from 1879 down to the present time.

In the 14 years during which Germany maintained a tariff for revenue only her industries languished, large numbers of her people were unemployed, her revenues were frequently inadequate, and poverty was steadily on the increase. After several years of study of the situation Prince Bismarck arrived at the conclusion that the real trouble with German industry—the fundamental defect—was the abandonment of a protective-tariff policy. In a series of communications to the several German States he repeatedly urged a return to the principle of protection. In a statement to the German Diet in 1878 he said:

> The return to the principle of protection all around has become necessary owing to the altered economic position of the world. In the revision of our fiscal policy we can be solely guided by the interests of Germany.
> The most important German industries are at present endangered by huge foreign industries whose production, owing to the greatly increased transport facilities, threatens the German market in a way that but a short time ago could not have been anticipated. Furthermore, foreign nations have learned—and the United States is an example—to dispense with German goods by surrounding themselves with hostile tariffs and by creating industries of their own in their country.
> As the unsatisfactory state of the German industries is not a recent growth, material to support the justified claims of our industries is not lacking. Two inquiries into the decay of two industries, which have particularly acutely suffered, were made last summer, and the conclusions arrived at are at the disposal of the various Governments.

Acting under his guidance, the German Empire returned to the protective tariff policy in 1879, her industries revived, her manufacturers captured markets throughout the world, and Germany became industrially independent, so far as it is possible for any nation to become.

Mr. J. Ellis Barker, a British writer on economic subjects, discusses the tariff policy of Germany in his book on Modern Germany, and after presenting detailed statistics to show how the industries of that nation prospered under the policies established by Bismarck, he summarizes in the following language the effect of protection in Germany and free trade in Great Britain:

> The change in the industrial character of Germany and in the character of her foreign trade is particularly striking if we study the change which has taken place in the nature of the Anglo-German trade. Formerly Germany sold to Great Britain raw materials and food, and bought from us our manufactured goods. Germany was Great Britain's farm, and Great Britain was Germany's factory. Now, Germany exports to Great Britain chiefly manufactures of every kind, and receives in return principally raw materials and food. Yarn apart, which is raw material to the German industries, and is therefore subject to only a slight duty, Great Britain exports to Germany chiefly coal, gold, silver, leather, furs, fish, caoutchouc, wool, copper, etc. According to the very reliable German customs statistics, almost exactly nine-tenths of the British exports to Germany consist of raw materials and food, whilst only one-tenth of the British exports to Germany are fully manufactured articles, such as machinery, woolen and cotton cloths, etc. Great Britain has become a hewer of wood and a drawer of water to Germany.

It is not I who makes this comparison between protected Germany and free-trade Britain. The comparison is made by a subject of the British Empire. I do not present the statement because of any feeling in favor of one country or against the other. I offer it because the experience of those European countries confirms the conclusions that any thoughtful student of economics should reach after a review of our own experiences under both protection and free trade.

It is well known to all observers that the Democratic Party, both through its official representatives and through the Democratic press, attributes the ills of business and the bad condition of Government finance to the outbreak and continuance of the war in Europe. Such was not always their explanation.

Industrial depression began soon after the election of a Democratic President. It was then a "psychological" condition of business, otherwise described as a "state of mind." While this explanation did not satisfy the thousands of manufacturers who were compelled to close down their mills for want of orders, or the hundreds of thousands of other business men who found themselves face to face with bankruptcy, nor the millions of laborers who were entirely thrown out of employment or put on part time, yet it sufficed for a political party which could find no better explanation. Just at the time when even the Democrats had lost confidence in their ability to delude the American people into believing that there was really nothing wrong with business, the war in Europe broke out, and thenceforth the industrial condition was attributed to the war.

Fortunately for impartial writers of history, however, it is unnecessary for us to accept this theory on the ipse dixit of men whose loyalty to their party impels them to find some cause other than the real. In the regular performance of their duties even the officials of a Democratic administration could not fail to record actual governmental transactions which prove the utter fallacy of the Democratic explanation of industrial depression. Government records demonstrate beyond possibility of dispute that the industrial depression grew steadily worse until the outbreak of the war, and that as soon as American producers and manufacturers could begin to fill orders received from the nations at war, business conditions began to improve and have continued to improve, now reaching the highest state in our history so far as foreign trade is concerned, although yet far from a satisfactory state in the matter of domestic trade.

The only accurate, dependable, and conclusive comparison that can be made for the purpose of showing the cause of industrial depression and the cause of such measure of restored activity as we have experienced is a comparison of a period entirely under Republican tariff laws with a corresponding period under a Democratic tariff law and before the beginning of the war in Europe, and also with a corresponding period of time also under the Democratic tariff law and after the war had exerted its beneficial influence upon American trade. Any other period would cover portions of two tariff laws, or portions of both peace and war conditions.

The only periods which meet these conditons and for which figures are available are 10-month periods ending with July in 1913, 1914, and 1915 of these respective years. The Democratic tariff law became effective on October 4, 1913. The war broke out on the last day of July, 1914. There was, therefore, only a 10-months' period under the Democratic tariff law before the war began.

I present herewith statistical tables showing our exports, imports, and balance of trade for these three 10-month periods, from which it will be seen that under the Democratic tariff law, prior to the beginning of the war, our imports increased and our exports decreased as compared with the corresponding period under Republican tariff rates. This was a period of industrial depression, because imports from foreign countries not only deprived the American producer of part of his market but the prospect of increased imports destroyed his confidence in his home market in the future. That was the period when millions of men were thrown out of employment and when bread lines were formed in every important city in the country. These tables also show that shortly after the outbreak of the war our imports decreased and our exports increased, due to the inability of the foreign producer to ship his commodities to our market and also to the enormous demands from nations at war for the products of our fields and ranges and factories.

IMPORTS, EXPORTS, AND BALANCE OF TRADE.

Imports, exports, and trade balances during the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff of 1913 (October, 1913, to July, 1914) under peace conditions and the period before the European war, compared with the corresponding periods of the Republican tariff under peace conditions and the Democratic tariff under the influence of protective war conditions.

Merchandise.	10 months ended July 31—
	1913, Republican peace period.	1914, Democratic peace period.	1915, Democratic war period.
Imports into United States:
Free of duty	$821,608,167	$988,187,549	$865,818,445
Dutiable	682,218,836	617,617,233	522,440,240
Total imports	1,503,827,003	1,605,804,782	1,388,258,685
Exports from United States:
Domestic	2,078,500,810	1,921,538,131	2,569,182,652
Foreign	31,965,829	30,040,165	48,515,984
Total exports	2,110,466,639	1,951,578,296	2,617,698,636
Excess of exports	606,639,636	345,773,514	1,229,439,951

In this connection it is worth while to make a further analysis of the period beginning with the enactment of the Underwood tariff law and up to the outbreak of the European war. I present herewith a table showing the monthly balances of trade, from which it will be seen that at the time the Underwood tariff law was enacted there was a large monthly balance in our favor and from the time that law took effect the balance decreased steadily until there was finally a monthly balance against us:

Month.	Excess exports.	Excess imports.
October, 1913	$138,976,158
November, 1913	97,333,856
December, 1913	48,900,194
January, 1914	49,713,394
February, 1914	25,948,408
March, 1914	4,736,280
April, 1914		$11,345,606
May, 1914		2,476,896
June, 1914		457,404
July, 1914		5,538,346
August, 1914		19,398,776
September, 1914	16,247,722
October, 1914	56,630,650
November, 1914	79,411,271
December, 1914	130,976,013

It will be observed that the monthly balance was against us from April, 1914, until after the outbreak of the European war, which reduced imports and created a demand for our products.

After having presented these statistics gathered from the official records of this administration—which certainly would not compile statistics adverse to its own interests unless compelled to do so—it would be a reflection upon the intelligence of Members of this body if I should undertake an argument designed to draw conclusions which are manifestly so obvious to every man who can read the figures and make deductions in the simplest forms known in logic.

One of the long-standing arguments of the Democrats has been that a protective tariff is chiefly to the advantage of the manufacturer and that it is not beneficial to the farmer. I shall not take time to discuss this at length further than to remark that the American farmer depends largely upon the laborer in American factories for a permanent and profitable market, and that import records show that immediately following the enactment of the Underwood tariff law imports of agricultural products very largely increased, which necessarily means that the foreign agricultural producer was able to sell in competition with the American farmer to an extent not possible under a Republican tariff law. It follows necessarily that if the importer could sell in our market he must have cut the price the American producer would otherwise have received. At the same time that this was done there was no corresponding decrease in the cost of living, which had been promised by the Democrats as a result of their tariff legislation.

It is evident, therefore, that the importer and the middleman made the profit due to the reduction of the tariff on agricultural products, and the farmer received a relatively lower price at the same time that the consumer paid more. I present a few illustrations of the effect of tariff reduction upon imports of various farm products:

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, Canadian farmers sold in the United States live stock to the value of a little more than $1,500,000, but in 1914 they cut into the market of the American farmer to the extent of $11,000,000. That gain of $9,500,000 was enough to make quite a jingle in the pocket of the Canadian stockgrower. That money went to help develop the Dominion of Canada.

In the fiscal year 1913 Canadian farmers sold in American markets only $2,750,000 worth of grain and flour, but in 1914 they shipped in enough of the same commodities to take away $12,440,000 of good American money. That is $9,690,000 to the gain of the Canadians. Leather added another $2,000,000 to the net gain of the Canadian producer. Wool imports from Canada gained $1,100,000 in 1914 as compared with 1913.

These four commodities—live stock, grain, hides, and wool—constituting the foundation of agriculture, yielded the Canadian producer a gain of over $22,000,000 in American markets under Democratic as compared with Republican tariff laws.

But Canadian farmers were not the only gainers by the reduction or removal of tariff duties on farm products. Mexican stockmen increased sales in the United States about $5,500,000; Argentina farmers enlarged their incomes to the extent of $7,000,000 by sales of grain, nearly $6,000,000 by sales of meat and dairy products, and $2,000,000 by sales of wool.

These commodities are the most important of agricultural importations and serve to illustrate the manner in which reduced tariffs on agricultural imports throw the American farmers into competition with producers of other nations. The war served to give those other countries a more profitable market than the United States, but the increase of $42,500,000 in agricultural imports from three nations in a period of nine months of the new tariff indicates what still greater injury would have been suffered by American producers had not the war intervened.

The assertion has been made by the Secretary of Commerce that the great increase in our foreign trade is not due chiefly to what are commonly known as war orders, the intent being to convey the impression that whatever measure of restored prosperity we have enjoyed has not been due to the war in Europe. Upon this subject comparative statistics have been compiled, which I present herewith, showing that our increase in exports has consisted largely of those articles which form the necessities of modern warfare and the support and equipment of modern armies and navies.

Since these statistics are taken from the records of this administration, they will hardly be disputed; and I submit without further argument the proposition that they conclusively prove that our increased exports have, in fact, been chiefly in the line of articles properly classed as "munitions of war," and in any event composed chiefly of "war orders." The fact that these increases took place after the war began is conclusive proof that the orders were due to the war and otherwise would not have been received. Here are the export figures:

Articles.	Sept. 1, 1912, to Aug. 31, 1913.	Sept. 1, 1913, to Aug. 31, 1914.	Sept. 1, 1914, to Aug. 31, 1915.

DEMOCRATIC EXTRAVAGANCE.

The practice of economy and return to Democratic simplicity was one of the strong pledges made during the 1912 campaign in an effort to secure votes for Democratic candidates. So vehemently was this promise proclaimed, not only by candidates and campaign managers but by the Democratic press, that there was fear in official circles that departmental bureaus would be handicapped by the great reductions that were to be made by the Democratic Party in the annual appropriations. The American people were led to believe that they would find the burden of Government lighter, and that the enormous waste which Democratic spellbinders had assured us had been incurred by Republican administrations would come to an end. Greatly to the surprise of all officialdom, and greatly to the disgust of the American taxpayer, instead of practicing even that degree of economy which was the consistent policy of the Republican Party, the Democrats entered upon a campaign of extravagance far beyond the dreams of any spoilsman in any party. The appropriations made by the Sixty-third Congress, at a time when both Houses and the Executive Office were in the control of the Democrats, were $177,000,000 higher than were made by the last Congress, in control of the Republicans.

At the same time that they ruined American industry by their tariff law and reduced the ability of the people to pay taxes, the Democrats increased the public burdens. The Egyptian taskmaster who compelled his slaves to make bricks without straw, would have looked with admiration upon the Democratic Party as it heaped the burden of taxes upon the American people, at the same time that it deprived them of profitable industry from which they could earn the money with which to pay the taxes.

In his address at the opening of the third session of the Sixty-third Congress President Wilson said, among other things, that he was confident that the American people cared little how much money the Government spent so long as they got what they wanted for it. This remark is of particular interest because of the pledge of economy under which the Democratic Party came into power. Reference to this is particularly appropriate because of the recommendations that have been made for appropriations for the support of that department which is under the direction and control of the man who has been the chief defender of the Democratic tariff law and the chief exponent of that species of temporary "spotted" prosperity which we are now enjoying. The Secretary of Commerce, in his annual report, asks for a doubling of the appropriations for his Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and the work which it is presumed to be doing. He asks for this enormous increase of appropriations, notwithstanding the steadily growing deficit in the Treasury, on the assertion that the work of this bureau has materially assisted in building up our export trade. Figures have recently been published, and they are worthy of the consideration of this body, showing that during the last 12 months of the Republican tariff our foreign trade with all those nations that are at peace gave us a favorable trade balance of $64,000,000, while trade with the same countries during the first 12 months of a Democratic tariff turned the balance against us to the amount of $189,000,000, and during the second 12 months found us with an adverse balance of $259,000,000.

If it is true that the American people do not care how much money is spent providing they get what they want for it, what application has that to a condition of affairs shown by the records under which the United States is losing instead of getting what it wants?

The Secretary of Commerce will hardly undertake to claim that the bureau referred to has been an agency in building up our marvelous trade in Europe. Everyone knows that such increased orders as we have received from Europe have been due to the extreme necessities of the nations engaged in war, and that not by any possibility could an agent of the American Government have been instrumental in securing that business. Instead of asking for an increased appropriation for a bureau under whose guidance we have lost trade with the nations at peace, the Secretary of Commerce should carefully examine the personnel of his official family and ascertain wherein he can make changes with a view to increasing rather than diminishing our sales to countries not involved in war.

GOVERNMENT BY MINORITY.

Denunciation of invisible government and a demand that legislation shall be conducted in the open instead of in secret was one of the popular arguments advanced by the advocates of the election of President Wilson and of Democratic candidates for the Senate and House of Representatives. It was believed by the American people that if they would place the Democratic Party in control of their Government official business would be conducted in the open, after free and full discussion, and under the principle of majority rule. Instead of carrying out its promise, the Democratic Party went to the other extreme and firmly established the system of caucus legislation, by which a majority of the Members of the Democratic Party bind all the Members of the majority party, and thereby force through Congress any legislation advocated by the party machine. Instead of conducting public business in the open, this legislative caucus is conducted behind closed doors, with no record vote taken and with the American people left entirely ignorant as to the identity of the men who are responsible for the legislation enacted.

This system of secret control of legislation is particularly pernicious, because the party in control is not only a minority party, but is itself dominated by men who represent a minority of population, a minority of business, a minority of industry, and a minority of taxpayers and tax payments.

As I have previously pointed out, the Census Bureau divides the country into three grand divisions—the North, the South, and the West. The 21 States given as North had in 1910 55,757,115 population, with 32,669,705 given as urban and 23,087,410 as rural (the rural population being that outside of cities of 2,500). The 16 States given as South, including all the old Southern States and Oklahoma, had 29,389,330 population, divided into 6,623,838 urban and 22,765,492 as rural. The 11 Western States had 6,825,821 population, divided into 3,329,840 urban and 3,495,981 rural. This grouping and these figures are those of the Census Office—not mine.

The Democrats have 229 Members here, and from these three grand divisions of the country I have named there are 95 Democrats from the North, 122 from the South, and 12 from the West. You have adopted the policy and the rule of electing the committees of this House, and how have you done it?

The Democrats from the South control and dominate the legislative machinery of the House and have the chairmanships of most of the great committees.

Southern Democrats have the chairmanships of the Committees on Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Rivers and Harbors, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post Office and Post Roads, and Indian Affairs, which handle appropriation bills; and they have the chairmanships of the Committees on Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, District of Columbia, Census, Claims, Education, Immigration and Naturalization, Public Lands, Insular Affairs, Public Buildings and Grounds, Judiciary, Revision of the Laws, Territories, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and Rules. Southern men are chairmen of 25 of the 35 important committees of this House, and they are the most important committees in preparing the legislation and controlling the machinery of the House.

On the basis of 229 Democratic Members, the Democratic majority over all is 23.

A quorum of the Democratic caucus is 115, and a majority of that caucus—58—has the power to make a caucus decree. The action of this majority of a quorum in a Democratic caucus absolutely binds the other 171 Democratic Members.

Therefore, whenever the Democrats are in control of the Nation the South dominates. A study of the question at close range, with the Democrats in control, convinces me that the failure of the Democrats in national affairs is in a large measure due to southern domination.

The South, with its 29,000,000 people, 23,000,000 of whom live on farms, sends 122 Democratic Members to the House of Representatives.

The North has 71,000,000 people. In the Sixty-third Congress it had 165 Democratic Members. The South had 125. One would naturally believe that 165 is more than 125, but in this instance that was not the case, for the 125 Democratic Members from the South dominated the 165 Democratic Members from the North and bound and gagged them in caucus, so that they were obliged to vote for whatever the southern Democrat proposed or be considered disloyal to their party.

You increased the imports by your free-trade policy; you decreased the exports; you reduced the revenue; you took 4,000,000 workmen out of employment; you destroyed investment, discouraged enterprise; you created chaos in the industrial world from one end of the country to the other because of your legislation, which admits free into American ports the products of European labor. Only the outbreak of the European war temporarily saved us from the disaster your legislation brought upon the country.

You came into power on the promise of economy, but you have been recklessly extravagant in the expenditure of the public money. You have taken no account of the Nation's needs; you have destroyed the opportunity of the people to make a livelihood; you have taxed them in the name of war to meet your extravagant expenditures. The appropriations during the session of Congress recently closed amounted to approximately $1,117,000,000 and were $90,000,000 more than those ever appropriated by a session of Congress under Republican rule.

You have found yourselves unable to raise revenue to meet the ordinary running expenses of the Government without new taxation.

The 122 men in the House, representing 23,000,000 people living on farms, dictate to all the rest of the American people without knowing anything at all of their needs.

Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, and California—12 States—elect 230 of the 435 Members of the House. These 12 States have 50 per cent of the population, three-fifths of the voters, five-sixths of the wage earners in manufacturing institutions, fifteen billion of the twenty billion of value of manufactured products, 50 per cent of the farm values; they pay $282,000,000 of the $380,000,000 collected from internal revenue, $33,000,000 of the $43,000,000 paid in corporation taxes for 1914, $24,000,000 of the $28,000,000 income tax; they have four billion out of the five billion of savings deposits, and are certainly entitled to the consideration which their importance in the fabric of America's activities justifies, but they have not had it under the present administration. Do you wonder that they complain?

You have passed legislation to regulate the conduct of the 10,000 different kinds of business in which the American people are engaged, in which they have $250,000,000,000 of capital invested, and not a man north of Mason and Dixon's line, not even a Democrat, was allowed to serve on the committee that drafted the legislation and engineered it through the House.

This is not government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It is government of all the people for a minority of the people by a minority of the people. Unless I greatly err in judgment, the next election will see a restoration of majority rule.

INEFFICIENCY AND SPOILS SYSTEM.

One of the most serious complaints that has been made against the management of public business is the lack of efficiency. It is universally recognized that Government service costs more than similar service would cost if conducted by private enterprise. The reason for this is that managers of private enterprise are guided chiefly by merit in the selection and retention of their employees. For a great many years in the early period of our history what is known as the "spoils system" ruled in all departments of our Government. From the Cabinet down public offices were used as political rewards.

In the last 25 years, however, beginning with the establishment of the classified civil-service system by a Republican administration in 1883, we have greatly enlarged the scope of the merit system in Government appointments. As a consequence, the efficiency of Government service has improved, and the American people have received much more service for every dollar of expenditure. It is practically impossible to find a man throughout the length and breadth of the United States who will question the assertion that the maintenance and support of the civil-service law promotes efficiency and secures economy.

Before his election President Wilson was an exponent of this idea. He was the vice president of the Civil Service Reform League. During his campaign he asserted his adherence to the principles embodied in the civil-service law. When he resigned his position in that organization because of his election to the Presidency, he emphasized his loyalty to that principle. His radical change of attitude on that subject is probably one of the most remarkable of the many reversals of his publicly expressed policies. The spoils system has been introduced by this administration in every department in which it has been possible for them to substitute political reward for the merit system.

If the spoils system existed only in the departments and subordinate bureaus, there might be some room for belief that the heads of the departments, and not the President, were responsible for it, notwithstanding the fact that the President himself has power to establish or change the rules in any of the departments presided over by members of his Cabinet. But when we consider appointments made by the President himself in offices so important that he could not have failed to ascertain the qualifications of the appointees, it is impossible, even from the most charitable view, to assume that the spoils system has been adopted without his approval. As I have heretofore shown, he has removed from office as ministers to foreign countries men who have had years of successful service in diplomatic work and has appointed in their stead men who are entirely lacking in experience and possessed no qualifications that would particularly commend them to appointment to such positions.

He appointed a country horse doctor to the head of the Bureau of Fisheries, and later transferred that same individual to the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

He appointed as the first member of his Cabinet a man whom he had previously expressed the desire to see "knocked into a cocked hat."

In view of these many instances of his own personal disregard of the merit system, there can be no doubt that return to the spoils system has the personal approval of President Wilson, in utter disregard of the public welfare.

FINANCIAL LEGERDEMAIN.

Although I have had a number of years' experience in the handling of large business matters, it is with some hesitation that I enter upon a discussion of the management, or rather mismanagement, of the Treasury Department. As every Member of this body knows, the Secretary of the Treasury has twice changed the form of the Treasury statement, so that it is now practically impossible for any but a Treasury expert to make a comparison of the condition of the Treasury to-day with its condition at the time it was turned over to the Democratic administration. Whether or not the Treasury balance is to-day an actual balance or merely an apparent balance, but is in reality a deficit, the fact remains that the Secretary of the Treasury has so manipulated the Treasury statement that it is impossible for even the trained business man to compare its condition to-day with its condition on March 4, 1913. This much is certain, however, that the Treasury Department is now carrying as available assets various funds that have been set apart for disbursing officers' accounts in remote sections of the United States, in Alaska, and in the insular possessions. No man in his private business would treat such funds as available assets. If the Comptroller of the Currency were to discover any national bank carrying such funds as available assets, he would very properly, in the performance of his duties, take steps to terminate such a misrepresentation of the bank's affairs.

The Treasury Department has also made changes in the classification of various articles of import to such an extent that it is extremely difficult in some instances to compare the imports and duties collected under the present law with the imports and duties collected under the Republican tariff act.

DEMOCRATIC VACILLATION.

It is not to be expected that thoughtful men, who govern themselves according to changing conditions, will pursue continuously a course they have once mapped out. It is to be expected that men who are guided by reason will sometimes change their minds when new facts have been presented for their consideration or further thought has convinced them of their error. I for one shall not condemn any political party or any member of a political party for occasionally changing his views and his course of conduct.

But there is a vast difference between an occasional change of attitude and a change that becomes so frequent as to indicate either an ill-considered opinion in the first instance or a weakness which demonstrates incapacity. The American people could readily expect an announcement of one or two changes of policy on the part of the Democratic Party in matters concerning which there is room for a reasonable difference of opinion, but the changes which have taken place in Democratic policies have been so numerous that no reasonable man can assume that they are consistent with both good intentions and sound sense. Either the Democratic Party must have been insincere when it made its platform or it was entirely lacking in sound judgment as to wise principles in government.

The Democratic Party's platform of 1912 pledged this administration to economy, but it has been the most extravagant in our history.

That same platform made promises of efficient administration, but in almost every department we have seen demonstrations of inefficiency.

We were promised maintenance of the merit system in the civil service—a promise that has been violated as frequently and as extensively as the Democratic Party has found possible.

Reduction of the high cost of living was a pledge which won many thousands of votes to the Democratic candidates, but the records of this administration show an increase in the cost of living at the same time that many hundreds of thousands and even millions of men were thrown out of profitable employment.

We were promised pitiless publicity—a promise that was utterly ignored from the day of inauguration and superseded by one of continued secrecy.

We were assured that the rights of American citizens would be maintained with dignity and honor wherever American citizens have a right to be, but we have seen American citizens slaughtered in the Republic to the south of us without anyone having been held to a strict or any other degree of accountability.

I quote from an editorial published in the Chicago Tribune on March 10, to show somewhat more in detail what has happened to Americans in Mexico:

Mexicans of the band, and, it is reported, under the leadership of Villa, crossed the border yesterday and attacked the town of Columbus, in New Mexico, and a camp of United States soldiers. The list of dead and wounded will be found elsewhere.

Americans were killed as they ran from burning buildings, as they tried to find shelter, and as they tried to defend themselves.

This was not done by border ruffians who have no nationality or who might be of any nationality. It was done by a Mexican organization which had been an army, which one time asked for recognition by the United States as the official governing organization of Mexico.

It was not done without precedent nor without cause. It was done because the United States has invited it. It was not an exhibition of spasmodic criminality. It was an expression of Mexican policy, encouraged by American policy.

What have we done to make the Columbus raid not only possible but inevitable? We began at Vera Cruz—to go back no further. We began by informing Americans that they would not be protected in Mexico, by ordering them to surrender their property to looters and to escape across the border if they could.

We began by surrendering the principle, sacred to every important nation, that peaceable people of our nationality must be secure in their lives and their property rights wherever they might be, whether it were in Tibet, Morocco, the South Pacific islands, Mexico, or elsewhere.

We began by telling Americans to run, to flee a country in which this Nation could not and would not protect them. When they did not run fast enough or did not run at all, and, thus falling, were murdered, we said that they ought to have had more speed or less stubbornness.

Possibly some Americans in Mexico were perplexed and could not understand the instructions they had received from home. They may have remembered that when the country was young and feeble it forced piratical countries on the north shore of Africa to respect Americans in the Mediterranean. They may have remembered that their Nation had looked after the security of its citizens, whether they were taken by Albanians, Moroccans, Kurds, or Chinese. They may not have understood that the United States had abandoned a principle upon which self-respecting nations insist.

They may not have understood it, but the Mexicans did. They saw at Tampico a town full of refugees left to the protection of a German warship, the American Fleet which ought to have protected them being ordered away to avoid having to protect them.

They saw at Vera Cruz an expedition landed to demand reparation for an insult to American dignity, and they saw that expedition, having done some necessary plumbing work and street cleaning in the city, embark and depart without having obtained the reparation.

The Mexicans understood. They thought they did, and they began to try their new knowledge out. They began to torture and murder American mine engineers, miners, ranchers, and business men. They found that they understood perfectly. A house occupied by an American family could be entered, the man shot, the woman assaulted, the money and other movable valuables taken, and the place burned. There were no consequences. A report would be made to enrich the archives of the Department of State of the United States of America. That was all.

The Mexicans thereupon devoted themselves to enriching these archives. They made a record which Americans of another generation may look upon with wonder. We look upon it with wonder now. The killing of Americans by twos and threes, even if they might be tortured first, insufficiently indulged the Mexican ambition.

It was necessary to kill them in groups, to put an end to them by squads of 10 and 20. We were able officially to divide the murders into five classes, such as:

Class 1, John McManus, killed defending his home in Mexico City.

Class 2, Charles Dalrymple, seen in prison at Victoria; no trace of him afterwards found.

Class 3, Weston Burwell, killed at Ozuluama by orders of a federal officer.

Class 4, C. M. Brown, shot and killed by Mayo Indians at Ahome.

Class 5, James O. Lawrence, murdered by Mexican civilian at Tampico.

The records were orderly. Whenever a report came to the State Department it was necessary merely to determine what class the victim had made and to file him away accordingly.

But this became too monotonous for the Mexicans. They followed the Americans who had escaped from Mexico and went after them and other Americans on American soil, thus introducing a new classification into the records.

They stalked American sentries; they jumped American outposts and American camps; they shot up American towns and killed American ranchers. If Americans were not safe in Mexico it was a fair assumption that they were not safe in the United States.

This is the background of the Columbus affair. A less affair of some years ago is known as the Boston massacre, but presumably massacre would be an unfriendly term to apply to the event in Columbus. Nevertheless it is permissible to reason from cause to effect. We invited what happened to the citizens of Columbus.

The raid on Columbus and the whole sorry course of Mexican outrages are the logical and inevitable effects of a policy which hung by a thread of theory in a vacuum of fact. The President has not only shown no comprehension of the conditions with which he was dealing in Mexico; he has seemed to prefer his own opinion to the truth. Both Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bryan resented the testimony of informed men and displayed a puerile distrust of any witness who had direct acquaintance with Mexico and the Mexicans. The bulk of such testimony came necessarily from men who had some stake in Mexico, but an adult mind ought not for that reason to have refused their testimony altogether. Every juryman is expected to be able to allow for the bias of prejudice or interest in witnesses; to discount, not to exclude. The administration's policy toward Mexico has ignored Mexican temperament, Mexican social facts, Mexican history. It has vacillated perpetually between drifting and critical interference. It has used all forms of force, naval, military, financial, and diplomatic, while asserting its purpose to permit the Mexican people freely to work out their own destiny. There never has been a greater divergence between theory and practice than the course of our Mexican policy shows.

The inevitable effect of our vacillations, our restraints, followed by violent interferences, is the reputation not only of insincerity and covert purpose but of cowardice.

This was predicted by the Tribune and by everyone who knew Mexico. It was as certain as anything in this world can be, and it was proved repeatedly as months of revolt and anarchy passed. But Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bryan had no respect for the facts or for anyone who knew the facts. They had their doctrine, and outrage, rapine, devastation were as nothing in the scale against it.

There was only one hope of avoiding the task of intervention, and that was thrown away by a grotesque misconception of primitive Mexican psychology. There was but one way to escape intervention, and that was by making it clear to Mexicans that the United States had a strong hand and a stern determination, which would be backed by instant force to protect the persons and the rights of its citizens. Instead we have bred, not confidence and friendship, but hatred, suspicion, and, what is more dangerous still, contempt.

Is the President going to refuse to face this now at last? The Villa raid, the murder of the 14 Americans at Santa Ysabel, the almost daily reports of attacks upon Americans ought to bring home the truth. It is a notorious fact that American life is cheaper than any in Mexico, except, perhaps, Spanish or Chinese. The Englishman, the German, the Frenchman, the Italian are left unmolested, while Americans are constantly insulted, robbed, and murdered. This is the reward of a policy the President deemed respectful of Mexican susceptibilities and considerate of Mexican sovereign rights.

It is staggering evidence of the confusion and unreality of our foreign policy that while we are at daggers drawn with Germany to enforce the "doubtful legal right" of our citizens to travel safely upon the armed merchantmen of Great Britain, a revolutionary leader, who narrowly missed recognition by our Government as the de facto head of Mexico, should be encouraged by our infirmity of purpose to ride over our borders to burn and slay.

It is time to face the full truth of the Mexican situation. Our period of free action grows rapidly shorter. The doctrinaire and the humanitarian will not control the policy of the European Governments whose nationals have been injured in person or property during the course of the Mexican upheaval. We shall be required to make good in our trust, and if we are still postponing and shirking we shall find that Europe will act.

These numerous vacillations and failures in almost every important promise of the Democratic Party can hardly be explained on the theory that newly acquired information has demonstrated the unwisdom of the attitude announced in the Democratic platform. In some instances the changes may be due to lack of sincerity when making promises and in other instances to a weakness in the Executive.

There is one plank of the Democratic platform upon which there has thus far been no vacillation, for the reason, apparently, that the time for a disclosure of a change of attitude has not yet arrived. I allude to the single-term plank. While this seems to be the yet unbroken pledge of the Democratic Party, there is still opportunity for its violation, and I have no doubt, judging by present appearances, that it is the intention of the Democratic Party and of its candidate of 1912, who was particularly pledged to the observance of the single-term principle, to disregard that pledge when the time comes to nominate a candidate in 1916. Having broken every other pledge it made, it would seem to be an opportune time for the Democratic Party to adopt consistency and break this remaining promise, thus showing that if they can not be consistent in anything else they can be consistent in inconsistency.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] should have injected any partisanship into the question which is now before us. [Laughter.] I welcome the situation presented by this bill when the brethren on both sides of the aisle may abide together in peace and amity. The seemingly impossible has happened. For the first time in a century, so far as my historical recollection goes, the Ways and Means Committee are absolutely united upon a tariff bill. The lion and the lamb lie down together, and all is, or ought to be, quiet along the Potomac.

I never hoped to live and see the day when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] could agree on a tariff on sugar. [Laughter.] But impossible though it may seem, this is the occasion we celebrate to-day. Possibly I should apologize to the gentleman from Michigan for likening him unto a lamb. [Laughter.] I am prepared to admit that he has few qualities in common with that gentle animal except possibly that they are both united in favor of a protective tariff on wool. [Laughter.] But the gentleman from Michigan may derive consolation from the confident expectation he doubtless cherishes that in the next Congress their positions will be reversed and he will be the lion and the gentleman from North Carolina will be the lamb. I am glad that the Democracy has experienced a change of heart; I rejoice that a great light has burst upon them. I well remember during my temporary absence from this House the prevalent and undenied report that the leader of the Democracy had demanded, while the Underwood bill was in process of germination, that at all events it must be founded on two definite propositions—there must be no duty on sugar and no duty on wool. It was announced that at the bedrock, at the very foundation, of Democratic tariff policy were free wool and free sugar. And I have heard—and I have no doubt that the report is true—that the President absolutely refused to sign a bill which would provide a duty on sugar or a duty on wool. And so, in spite of the fact that the Underwood law was entitled a tariff for revenue, they blithesomely threw away about $100,000,000 a year, and now they come to us with a proposition to save something out of the wreck.

Now comes the President of the United States and through the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, who happens to be now the official administration son-in-law—a position which I do not envy him [laughter]—now comes the President and asks us to repeal the provision that sugar shall go on the free list after the 1st of May and provide that the present duty of something more than 1 cent a pound shall be indefinitely retained. Such a reversal of policy a year or so ago might have been regarded as extraordinary, but we have gotten so used to this sort of thing that to-day it hardly affords an opportunity for even passing comment. [Laughter.] It is only one of those instances which excite our sympathy for those generals and colonels and lieutenants of Democracy who are heroically trying to follow their leader, who are trying to adapt themselves from one day to another to the various and ofttimes contradictory positions he takes on practically every great matter of national concern. It excites our sympathy also, mine certainly, when I see my friends upon that side of the aisle who happen to be of a portly habit trying to make contortionists of themselves. I am not surprised at the worried look that is upon many ordinarily placid faces when the even tenor of their political course is interrupted by having to make themselves daily entrants in a guessing contest.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] the other day, in a very forceful and brilliant speech, remarked that it would be easier to "stand by" the President if he would himself stand still. That remark reminded me of the experience of a farmer in my part of the country. He had just hired a green farm hand and was starting to break him in. Early one morning he took him out to plow a field, and when the farm hand asked for instructions the farmer said, "Do you see that red heifer standing over there on the other side of the field? Plow toward the red heifer." Late that afternoon when he returned a most extraordinary sight met his eye. Instead of the furrows running straight and parallel with each other, they ran in some places in figure eights, in others triangles, and in still other places in double crosses. [Laughter.] When he indignantly demanded of the farm hand the reason for this extraordinary piece of plowing, that gentleman replied, "I followed instructions. You told me to plow toward the red heifer, and I done it." [Laughter.]

Of course, Mr. Chairman, nothing that I have said here is by way of criticism of members of the Ways and Means Committee for bringing in this bill or in criticism of the administration that has fathered it. On the contrary, I highly commend the action of both. I do not care how the bill got here, suffice it that it is here. I commend it to Members of this House as a good bill. It is a protective bill. It is a bill which will go far to keep alive the great cane-sugar industry of the State of Louisiana. It will go far to keep alive the great beet-sugar industry of the West and the Middle West—both doomed to death on the 1st of next May, unless this bill should pass. Moreover, it will bring absolutely necessary revenue into a well-nigh exhausted Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, personally I would have been glad to see this proposition yoked with a proposition to put a reasonable duty on raw wool. Both stand on all fours, and should be treated alike. But even if it were germane I would not offer to-day an amendment to put a duty on wool. I want this bill passed as it is, and I want it done as soon as possible, fearful, as I am, that if it be not passed speedily somebody might change his mind again. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I welcome you, my friends of the Democracy, to at least limited membership in the Republican Party. [Laughter.] I rejoice that at last you are with us in our efforts to maintain American industry. I find myself, as a matter of fact, at a loss for a word in the English language adequate to express my feeling upon this happy day. You will pardon me if I resort to a word from another language, one of the most beautiful and expressive words in any tongue, a word which combines more of good fellowship and friendliness and welcome in its highest sense than any other I know of, a word which is familiar to any of you who have ever sojourned in the Hawaiian Islands—aloha, my Democratic friends; aloha! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, before I begin my speech I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to appear to be lacking in appreciation of the courtesy of a colleague, but I must decline the invitation extended by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. I can not join the Republican Party to-day. I do not expect to join the Republican Party in the future. I shall vote as I think a Democrat should vote on this proposition. That means that I shall vote against the pending bill.

In my judgment this bill might very properly be entitled, "A bill to authorize the addition of 1 cent a pound to the retail price of sugar, with authority to divide the proceeds 'fifty-fifty' between the United States Treasury and the Sugar Trust."

I come from the State of Colorado, one of the greatest sugar-producing States in the Union. I shall vote against this bill to-day because in two campaigns I promised the people of my district that if given the opportunity I would vote to take the tariff off sugar. So, I will cast a negative vote in order to redeem the personal pledge made to my constituents. But I will do more than that. I will vote against this bill as a protest against my party stultifying itself on this great issue.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, when the Democratic Party votes to place a tariff on sugar it comes mighty near abandoning the fight for tariff reform. It will be extremely difficult to convince the people of this country that they should take tariff-reform talk seriously when the party which has taken tariff reform for its principal issue votes to place or to retain a duty on sugar.

There might have been a time when the tariff on sugar could be defended, but that defense can not be made to-day. There may have been a time when those who believed in the protective principle might have said that they voted for a tariff on sugar because an infant industry required protection, but to-day the people of the United States are paying record prices for sugar and the men who own sugar factories are gathering in greater dividends than they ever collected in the history of this country.

On the one hand we have the consumers of sugar in this country paying more for sugar than they probably ever paid before in the history of this country. Sugar is to-day selling on the New York market for 6.5 cents a pound. On the other hand we have the men who produce the beets, the farmers of my district and the farmers of every other beet-sugar district in this country, receiving practically the same price that they received when the price of sugar was very much lower.

A gentleman a few moments ago stated that the reduction of the sugar tariff brought about by the Underwood bill had not affected the price of sugar to the consumer. That is a misstatement which has been persistently spread from one end of this country to the other. The Sugar Trust and its allied interests through its great press agency—and I want to commend it for the skill it has exhibited in establishing one of the most powerful press agencies ever known in this country—have worked day and night since the European war began to create the impression that a partial removal of the tariff on sugar has not brought any benefit to the consumers of this country.

I hold in my hand a publication prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor. This publication makes a comparison of the prices of the various necessities of life for the period between 1907 and June, 1915. This comparison demonstrates that for five or six months prior to the outbreak of the European war, which occurred on the 1st of August, 1914, the consumers of this country were purchasing sugar at a lower price than they had purchased it through the entire period covered by this report.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Was not that during the time when the domestic sugar was on the market?

Mr. KEATING. No; it was not.

Mr. FORDNEY. When was the time referred to?

Mr. KEATING. It was up to the 1st of August, and the gentleman knows, as I know, that the domestic product does not come on the market until late in the fall, and that year, instead of the price falling when the domestic product came on, the price went up. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No, my friends, the reduction of the tariff brought about by the Underwood bill benefited the consumers. In the campaign of 1912 the Democratic national committee declared that if Woodrow Wilson were elected President and a Democratic Congress were elected, that the housewife would be enabled to purchase 25 pounds of sugar for a dollar. Pamphlets were spread all over the country containing that promise, and here in eastern cities that particular pledge of the Democratic Party was redeemed, and if the Democratic Party stood by its guns the housewives of this country would for all time, under normal conditions, purchase at least 25 pounds of sugar for a dollar, and probably more.

But to get back to this report from the Labor Department. I will not weary you with a mass of figures. This report shows that in July, 1914, the month before the European war broke out, you could purchase as much sugar at retail for 88 cents as you could purchase in August, the month following, for $1.33. In other words, the European war, according to this official report and according to the experience of every housewife in this country, forced an advance of 50 per cent in the retail price of sugar.

Who benefits, my friends, from the retention of this tariff? One gentleman carelessly remarked that by the Democratic Party attempting ot give the people free sugar we deprived the Federal Government of over $100,000,000 in revenue. Of course, every gentleman who has examined the figures knows that that statement is not accurate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman referred to me, I presume?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I said by changing the existing duties on sugar and the existing duties on wool that $100,000,000 was lost, which is absolutely correct.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman included wool——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did.

Mr. KEATING. I have no desire to dispute the proposition, because I do not happen to have the figures on wool at hand, but I understood the gentleman to say sugar alone.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; not at all.

Mr. KEATING. To-day by placing a tariff of 1 cent a pound on sugar you increase the price of sugar to the consumers of this country 1 cent a pound, and that means that the consumers of the country will pay $80,000,000 a year more for their sugar than they would if we had free sugar; and it does not mean that that $80,000,000 will go into the Treasury of the United States, because one half of the sugar that you sell in this country is imported and the other half is produced here. Under our tariff system Uncle Sam collects the 1 cent on each pound of sugar imported and nothing on the sugar produced here. So, as I stated at the very beginning, you collect $80,000,000 from the consumers of this country, and you divide it "50-50" with the Sugar Trust and its allies, $40,000,000 going to the treasury of the Sugar Trust and $40,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States.

Now, my friends, what is the necessity for this bonus to this particular industry? What is the financial condition of the sugar factories in this country? The sugar factories pay the farmers less than 2 cents a pound for the sugar content of their beets. The cost of extracting sugar, putting it in sacks, and preparing it for shipment—and I am now speaking in round figures—does not exceed 1 cent per pound, varying according to the efficiency of the factory. But when you say that a modern factory paying $5.50 per ton for 15 per cent beets can produce sugar at a net cost of 3 cents a pound you are well within the facts. In a great many factories they produce the sugar for less. And to-day, with sugar selling for $6.65 a hundred, it means that the Sugar Trust and its allies clean up on every sack of domestic sugar sold in this country $3.65 a hundred.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will you kindly tell us why Mr. Spreckels's company wanted sugar on the free list if the duty was beneficial to his company?

Mr. KEATING. If you will tell me why the American Sugar Refining Co.—the Sugar Trust—wants the tariff left on sugar I will answer your question. I am not the custodian of Mr. Spreckels's policy. I am speaking here as a representative of Colorado; as a representative, I trust, of the consumers of the United States. I am not pleading for Mr. Spreckels; I am not pleading for the American Sugar Refining Co.; but I want the consumers of the United States to benefit from the reduction of the price of sugar.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; although I have but very little time.

Mr. FORDNEY. You have asked the gentleman to tell you why the American Sugar Refining Co. want the duty retained. In every instance they have appeared and pleaded that they wanted sugar on the free list. Never have they asked for a retention of the duty.

Mr. KEATING. The American Sugar Refining Co., through its official representatives, has not only not asked for the repeal of the sugar tariff, but has uniformly urged the retention of the tariff.

Mr. FORDNEY. Never in the world.

Mr. KEATING. Take your own hearings.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what I referred to.

Mr. KEATING. All right, sir. Examine those hearings and you will find my statement is correct.

Mr. HOWARD. Will you yield just for one minute?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman made his statement about the reduction of sugar under the first period of the Underwood bill. Here is an authoritative statement:

Under the new rates from March 1 to July 1, 1914, the refiners' selling price of refined sugar averaged 3.81 cents per pound as compared with an average price for the previous 10 years of 4.85 cents per pound.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEATING. Pardon me——

Mr. AUSTIN. I asked you a question and you declined to answer it by asking me a question.

Mr. KEATING. I can not yield to the gentleman at this time, because my time is limited. In answer to his question as to the attitude of the American Refining Co., the so-called Sugar Trust, perhaps this pamphlet which I hold in my hand will give him some interesting information.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Lowry and Mr. Spreckels were lobbying to put sugar on the free list.

Mr. KEATING. I told the gentleman I was not representing Mr. Spreckels or Mr. Lowry. I do not know why they want sugar on the free list. I am not interested in what they do. I know that free sugar will benefit the consumers of the United States, and I stand here to advocate free sugar for that reason. If the gentleman wants a more direct answer, I do not know how I can furnish it.

But I want to call attention to what the Sugar Trust itself in its annual statement tells about its interest in this proposition. Here is the annual report of the American Sugar Refining Co., to be released at noon on March 8, 1916. In this report, under the heading "Income from investments," I find:

The profit and loss account shows a larger return on income from investments than in 1914. This is owing to larger dividend returns from its [the Sugar Trust's] holdings of beet-sugar stocks, which companies, as producers of their own raw material, have prospered greatly with the higher range of values.

And on other pages of this report—the report of the American Sugar Refining Co., the Sugar Trust—they give figures to show that more than one-third of their net profits are taken from their investments in beet-sugar companies. And still the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] will tell you that the Sugar Trust is urging the removal of the tariff on sugar, when, according to its own annual report—the very latest report, the one which was released at noon on March 8, 1916—it is shown that one-third of their net profits are gathered from beet-sugar companies.

Now, how about these domestic sugar companies—these infant industries that we are about to save from destruction? And on that point I would suggest to the gentlemen that, before they talk about the beet-sugar industry having been threatened with destruction under the Wilson administration, they look up the facts concerning the output of beet sugar. They will find that the output of beet sugar under the Democratic administration was fully as great as under Republican administrations, and in some cases greater. And what is the present condition of these sugar companies?

Here we have the Onema Sugar Co., of the Hawaiian Islands. That company is benefited by this tariff, and it has issued a statement showing that in 1915 they earned 54 per cent on its stock. Here are the Porto Rican sugar companies, which also come in under it. There is the South Porto Rico Sugar Co., capitalized at $8,000,000, half preferred and half common, and last year it earned sufficient to pay 8 per cent on the preferred and 10 per cent on the common stock and leave a balance to be set aside of $1,000,000. They are now said to be earning over 50 per cent on the common stock.

Let me take you to my own State, the State of Colorado, where the Great Western Sugar Co. owns a great many sugar factories in the northern counties. The Great Western Sugar Co. divides its stock into common and preferred. The preferred represents the actual investment; the common stock is water.

On March 1, 1914, the preferred stock was selling at $91 a share. On February 1, 1916, it commanded $112 a share, an increase of $21. But the company's common stock on the 1st of March, 1914, was commanding $45 a share, and to-day, on the New York Stock Exchange, for that common stock $168 is bid and $178 is asked.

Talk about your "war stocks." Why, Mr. Chairman, the increase in value of the common stock of the Great Western Sugar Co. represents a profit of not less than $15,000,000 to the fortunate owners. The munition makers of America "have nothing on" our sugar magnates in the matter of inflated dividends.

How much of that enormous sum goes to the farmers who raise the beets for the sugar factories of the Great Western Sugar Co.? Not one dollar.

The other beet-sugar companies of the West have experienced similar increases in stock values. It is asserted by those who are familiar with Wall Street operations that the combined total advances in value of the stocks of four of the big beet-sugar companies of this country amount to $35,000,000, and that of this $24,000,000 represents the advance in the value of the watered stock.

Here is an interesting item bearing on this point, which was sent out to its customers by the San Francisco News Bureau, Monday, March 6, 1916, under the heading "Hawaiian sugar stocks":

While stocks continue to climb, investors, speculators, and all persons interested in Hawaiian sugar stock or its profits, which means practically all the business men in the Territory, are wondering how large a part of the millions now held in reserve will be paid out in special dividends. That extra dividends will be declared by most of the companies is generally conceded on all hands, though no intimation of any official nature has been given out that any such plan is in the wind. Dividends of from 20 to 30 per cent, and even higher in some instances, were paid by the sugar companies during 1915; but, without exception, those on a paying basis piled up huge reserves because of the then uncertain prospect of the sugar tariff. Free sugar is not even a remote danger, and there is no prospect of an early termination of the European war to reduce prices. With land and mills in the best condition ever known in the history of the industry on these islands, and with bulging treasuries, it is held certain that big dividends will be paid as soon as the bill repealing the free-sugar clause has safely passed Congress and been signed by the President. Sixteen companies had on hand cash balances totaling $8,751,000 at the end of 1915, according to the best obtainable information.

Secretary McAdoo, early in October, 1915, gave out an interview stating that he believed the tariff on sugar should be retained. The effect of the Secretary's statement was to cause a sharp advance in the price of sugar. On October 7, 1915, granulated sugar was selling on the New York market for $4.80. On October 21 it had reached $5.14. On November 4 it jumped 10 cents more, to $5.24. On November 11, when it became apparent that the President of the United States was supporting the Secretary of the Treasury, the price of sugar went to $5.73. The price of sugar continued to climb until, on February 24, it was selling for $6.25 on the New York market. Now it commands $6.65 in New York.

It is difficult to estimate how much the sugar consumers of this country have paid to the sugar interests in the last six months as the result of the determination to retain the tariff on sugar. It is safe to say, however, that the total amounts to tens of millions of dollars, and if placed in the United States Treasury would be sufficient to build a battleship or two or a whole school of submarines.

The sugar prices I have quoted are taken from the New York reports. Out in the West, where we produce the sugar, we are compelled to pay more for granulated sugar than the people of any other section of the country. It will probably be a surprise to most of the Members of this House to know that the housewife who lives at the door of the sugar factory in Colorado pays 55 cents a hundred more for her beet sugar than does the housewife who preserves fruit in one of the flats of Harlem. In other words, under the beneficent rule of the Sugar Trust and its beet-sugar allies, the people of the West are fined hundreds of thousands of dollars a year because they live in the vicinity of sugar factories, and the combine ships western sugar across the continent and sells it for less than it charges in the greatest sugar-producing States in the Union. To illustrate this point I will place in the RECORD a little table showing New York and Denver prices of sugar for last month:

Prices of refined granulated.

	New York price, cane.	Denver price.
		Cane.	Beet.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Feb. 3	6.00	6.55	6.35
Feb. 17	6.00	6.55	6.36
Feb. 17	6.10	6.65	6.45
Feb. 24	6.25	6.80	6.60

Since the above table was compiled the New York price has advanced to 6.65 cents, and, of course, there has been a corresponding increase in the Denver quotation.

These are the wholesalers' prices; that is, the price at which the wholesale grocer must buy from the refiner. The price to the consumer is, of course, higher, as it includes the wholesalers' and retailers' profit.

Mr. Chairman, I am an old-fashioned Democrat. I believe that a platform pledge is a sacred contract between a party or a candidate and the voters, and that it should be observed in letter and spirit.

The only excuse a Democrat can give for voting for this bill is that the National Treasury needs the money. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that as a result of the war the Underwood tariff bill has not produced the anticipated revenue, and that it is necessary for Congress to avail itself of additional sources of revenue; but that does not justify the retention of the tariff on sugar. There are plenty of other ways by which the needed money could be secured without violation of platform pledge and without placing an unreasonable burden on the masses of the people. For instance, we might place a tax on munitions of war. The daily papers are filled with stories of the enormous profits that are being gathered in by the men who are supplying arms to the belligerent nations of Europe.

The war has disturbed our fiscal affairs; therefore we would be justified in compelling those who profit from the war to reimburse us for our loss of revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, to favor a bill supported by the President of the United States and at the same time indorsed by the majority leader would certainly give Republicans a thrill much more pleasurable, perhaps more unusual, and vastly less dangerous than a passage on a belligerent armed ship. [Laughter.] Yet this is the peculiar situation in which we are placed.

Well said the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that we have been legislating on sugar for seven years. I can corroborate him for five years, because that is the term of my service here. It has been sugar legislation all that time, supplemented by sugar investigations, with added sugar speeches, until we have had five years of legislative "linked sweetness long drawn out." [Laughter.]

That the President of the United States and the Republican Members of the House and the majority leader can agree upon a proposition like this is explained by our peculiar tariff schedule. Sugar, you know, is a part of Schedule E. I am interested chiefly in Schedule G, the agricultural schedule. Sugar, they say, catches more flies than vinegar, which comes under Schedule G, and that may be the reason why Schedule E is more effective and harmonizing to men of all parties and stations than Schedule G. And yet, before I close I trust to give you some revenue figures away up in G. [Laughter.]

The political cave man from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], who opened this debate, came out of his gloom, and for the first time in years we again hear of "the robber tariff," "the robber protective tariff." When I first came to Congress that was the phrase most hackneyed here—"the robber tariff," and the old "he robber" of all the brigands, pirates, and robbers of the world was the sugar tariff; and, yet, monster as it is, it is about to be embraced by its old professed enemies. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The tariff sought to be retained here is practically what many Republicans sought to have permanently in the Underwood law.

I would not suggest, perhaps, that "we told you so" some years ago, because it might be ungenerous. But let me recite what a good Democratic brother said recently, who voted for free sugar some time ago and who will now support this measure. He said, "If we are going to eat our political words, which we will have to in the next few years, I would rather begin on sugar than anything else." [Applause on the Republican side.]

And really, gentlemen, I approve of his taste. Your protective-tariff policy, soon to be swallowed, will be thus sugar-coated. I am for this bill, notwithstanding the reasons given by the chairman of the committee. I am for it on account of one of the reasons given by the chairman, and also for a reason which was excluded from the report made by him. The first reason why I favor it is the good old reason which the landlord out in the Rocky Mountains gave to Mark Twain in the morning when asked for his bill for lodging and breakfast. It was out in the State whence comes my friend KEATING, from Colorado, who seems to have little concern in the interests of his own State. The reason for charging Mark Twain $27.50 for lodging and breakfast was that the landlord needed the money. [Laughter on the Republican side.] In this case the Treasury needs the money. Therefore I am in favor of the bill from the revenue standpoint. I shall discuss it almost entirely from the revenue standpoint, although I should much prefer to discuss it from the protective standpoint, because within the bill itself the principal factor, the principle which is to be reestablished and continued in this country, is much greater than the dollars and cents involved; because, gentlemen, treat it as you will, it is the rebuilding of the American system of protection, for which every man on the majority side, in some form, will be voting before the adjournment of this Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The wounded Irish soldier in the Dardanelles campaign captured by the Turks, in the name of the Savior, begged for a drink of water. Being denied it on account of his religion, he was told that if he had asked for it in the name of Allah he would have obtained it. He said, "Well, if Mr. Allah is in control of the waterworks, let the water be mine and the credit his till after the war." We are discussing this bill on a revenue basis, while some of us would prefer to discuss it from a protection standpoint, for that is one of its major features; but that can wait till after the war.

Why, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] came out of his gloom several years behind the times and deprecated the protective doctrine. Has he been so long in his retreat of obscurity and without the light that he has not learned that over across the water the statesmen and the leading business men of the British Empire have agreed that before this war is closed, or immediately thereafter, they would adopt the American system of protection? [Applause on the Republican side.] Has he not learned, as one of the most important lessons of this great war, aside from militarism and navalism, that the world has looked at the marvelous feat, not of arms, of the great German Empire—the marvelous industrial feat—by which that limited Empire, within herself, cut off from all outside intercourse, has stood now for nearly 20 months, living upon the products of her own soil, fighting with the products of her mines, and using alone the products of her own factories against the fields, the factories, and the mines of all the world? And while we would avoid the militarism of Germany and the navalism of the British Empire, the United States and every other important nation of the world will, within the next five years, be copying after the protective system of Germany, which protects equally all the products of her mines, her factories, and her farms. [Applause on the Republican side.] Moreover, there is pending in this House a measure, supported by the majority and indorsed by the President, for a tariff commission. And it would be an ill compliment to its supporters to say it was for simply ornamental purposes. A tariff commission without a protective policy would be as useless "as the tick on the tip of the tail of the dog owned by the wild man of Borneo." Further, there is favored by the majority and the administration the adoption of an antidumping clause, which is at once dynamic and heroic protection. In fact an antidumping clause is the acme, the zenith, the ne plus ultra of protection. It is the 42-centimeter international-trade gun on this side now.

The gentleman from Mississippi said that the tariff on farm products was a delusion and a snare. He said he was going to give some figures. I do not know what they will be. I will aid him by presenting some that I have of my own. As I am going to discuss this subject from the revenue standpoint, for the purpose of my argument I will concede what he has said, and if what he has said is true and the figures I submit are correct, we have thrown away during the first two years after the adoption of the Underwood tariff law $91,479,327 which rightfully should be in the United States Treasury. If, as he insists, the removal of duties from the imported farm products of this country had not the effect of modifying or controlling prices or volume of imports, or effecting those things that protectionists claim and others charge, then we have thrown away before this on the 27 leading products of the Northwest, not including sugar, since the passage of the Underwood tariff law, more than $100,000,000 that ought to be in the United States Treasury to-day. And what a grateful picture it would be to the administration eye to-day!

To be more exact, I have prepared the figures for two years following the passage of that law and for two years preceding the passage of that law, and I shall submit them. I consider them on a two years' basis on 27 leading northwestern products, not including sugar, but I shall speak of sugar because it is here.

On the two years' basis, if the estimate of the majority leader is correct, the duty on sugar would be $88,308,375. That is the net estimate for two years.

Second. The next one in order of the great products of the Northwest which has been denied its privilege of contributing to the Treasury of the United States is raw wool, and the amount of money lost to the Treasury of the United States by reason of the removal of the tariff on raw wool is $56,262,277 for the first two years of the Underwood law. Gentlemen, that is more than all the money that is paid by all the burdened business of the United States for stamps for all its documents since the emergency law was passed in October, 1914.

Third. Following wool the next great revenue-producing agricultural product is cattle. The loss in revenue on cattle by removal of the tariff for two years was $11,263,000. Now that was lost to the United States Treasury. Where did it go? Immediately after the duty was taken off by the Underwood tariff law the shrewd Mexicans down there, who are able to handle us in various ways, saw fit to put on an export duty almost equal to our former import duty, and the money that should have come into the Treasury of the United States was diverted into the war chests of Huerta, Carranza, and Villa. It is a fact, probably, that a large part of that diverted cattle duty, which should have come into the United States Treasury, was used to purchase the arms which recently spoke so fatefully at midnight in Columbus on the New Mexican border, and to-day may be leveled from ambush at the United States soldiers as they seek the bandit Villa.

In the Hoosier Schoolmaster there is a character known as Jones; and Jones, speaking on education, insisted that "lickin' and larnin'" held fast company. The amount of this duty lost on cattle would more than pay for all the stamps on all the paper of the farmers and cattlemen of the United States since the passage of that law. The cattlemen and farmers have been "lickin'" under the stamp act, and do not you for a moment imagine that they have not been "larnin'." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

To illustrate, I quote from the Nebraska Live Stock Feeders' Association resolutions recently adopted:

> Whereas the placing of live stock and meats on the free list has resulted in increasing the control of the large slaughterers over the prices paid for live stock in this country, and when normal conditions are restored it is likely there will be large importations of foreign meats which will greatly depreciate prices in our home market.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Fourth, Mr. Chairman, the loss of duty on dairy products for that period has been $4,208,707. That would more than pay for all the stamps placed by all the widows and orphans on their notes and mortgages, and all the notes given by all the laboring men of the United States combined.

Fifth. On oats the loss was $2,640,000. That would more than equal the wild-oats bill of all the Members on this side of the House, and the better ones over there. [Laughter.]

In two years these amounts on just these northwestern articles, not including sugar, make a total of $91,479,327. Now, the imports of these articles for the last two years before the passage of the Underwood law amounted to $144,182,000. For the two years after the passage of the law the importations of these articles had increased to $305,935,000. Yet the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], an agricultural State, says that the tariff had nothing to do with farm products, their importation, price, or sale.

There was an increase of free imports in 1914 over 1912 of $240,000,000. Of these $140,000,000 were farm products. All others, $100,000,000. Stated in percentages—farm products, 58 per cent; all others, 42 per cent.

There was an increase in all exports in 1914 over 1912 of $159,000,000. Of this, $64,000,000 only was farm products and $95,000,000 all others. Stated in percentages—farm products, 40 per cent; all others, 60 per cent.

In other words, the farmers were forced to meet $140,000,000 increased import competition in exchange for the advantage of $64,000,000 increased export. Or, stated in percentages, the farmer was forced to accept a 58 per cent increase of imports competition for a 40 per cent increase in exports of his product, while all others were given the benefit of a $95,000,000 export increase for a $100,000,000 import increase. In the matter of increase caused by the new law, the farmer found a balance of trade increase against him of $76,000,000, while all others had a balance of trade increase against them of only $5,000,000—mighty nearly the old sacred rate of 16 to 1.

Concerning the leading northwestern products, namely, cattle, horses, sheep, other animals, including poultry, bread and biscuits, corn, oats, wheat, potatoes, all other vegetables, and wool, the following comparison will be interesting:

FIRST COMPARISON.

First nine months, new law, with corresponding months in last year of old law: Old-law imports, $49,727,159; new-law imports, $130,692,543; increase, 162 per cent.

SECOND COMPARISON.

First full year of new law compared with last corresponding period under the old law: Old-law imports, $63,342,993; new-law imports, $166,020,946; increase, 162 per cent.

THIRD COMPARISON.

First 21 months of the new law compared with the last corresponding period of the old law (it will be noted that this period contains 10 months nonwar period and 11 months war period): Old-law imports, $132,395,694; new-law imports, $273,718,123; increase, 106 per cent.

TOTAL IMPORTS FOR 21 MONTHS UNDER NEW LAW COMPARED WITH LAST 21 MONTHS UNDER OLD LAW.

Total imports under old law, $2,229,780,348; total imports of foodstuffs and raw wool, $556,533,733, or 24 per cent of the total. Total imports under new law, $3,121,285,761; total imports of foodstuffs and raw wool, $1,003,809,279, or 32 per cent of the total. This shows an increase in imports of $891,505,413, of which food products and raw wool was $447,265,546, or 50 per cent. While the imports of foodstuffs and raw wool increased 80 per cent, the increase of all other products was only 20 per cent.

FREE IMPORTS.

Of the total free imports during the last 21 months of the old law, amounting to $1,215,461,871, 18 per cent, or $228,337,714, were foodstuffs and raw wool. For the first 21 months under the new law the total free imports were $1,927,895,375, of which $557,519,898, or 29 per cent, was foodstuffs and raw wool. This shows an increase of $712,433,504, of which foodstuffs and raw wool furnish $329,182,184, or 46 per cent. While the imports of foodstuffs and raw wool under the free list increased 144 per cent, the increase of all other products on the free list was only 38 per cent.

REVENUE.

If the old rates were levied upon the imports of these 27 articles for the first 21 months under the new law, the revenue would amount to $88,377,947 (Treasury figures). The amount actually collected for a period of 21 months under the new law was $9,283,577. As a revenue producer, Schedule G, the farm schedule, from the enactment of the Dingley law up to and including 1912, presents some interesting and surprising facts—

First. Schedule G in 1897 in value of dutiable imports ranked No. 5, while in 1912 it had become first.

Second. The dutiable imports under Schedule G in 1897 was $33,716,958, while in 1912 it had risen to $117,711,156.

Third. While Schedule G in 1897 had but 8 per cent of all the dutiable imports, in 1912 it had 14 per cent.

Fourth. The dutiable imports of Schedule G increased more between 1897 and 1912 than any other schedule except one.

Fifth. In point of revenue brought into the Treasury Schedule G in 1897 ranked ninth. In 1912 it had risen to third place.

Sixth. Schedule G in 1897 produced only 5 per cent of the import revenues. In 1912 it produced 11 per cent.

Seventh. The revenues of Schedule G in 1897 were less than those of Schedule C (metals). In 1912 they were twice as great.

Eighth. The revenues of Schedule G in 1897 were less than one-half those of Schedule F (tobacco). In 1912 they exceeded F by nearly $9,000,000.

Ninth. Schedule G in 1897 was approximately equal to Schedule H (spirits). G in 1912 doubled H in revenue production.

Tenth. Schedule G produced less revenue in 1907 than I (cotton manufactures). In 1912 it produced three times that of I (cotton manufactures), D (lumber), and K (wool, raw wool eliminated) combined.

Men will say that low estimate must be reduced by the factor of stimulation of imports on account of the reduction or removal of duties. That is true, but that reduction must be diminished by the following considerations:

First. The increase of these articles for the first nine months under the new law, unaffected by war, was 162 per cent, indicating how much larger increase the two-year increase might have furnished if not in any wise affected by war.

Second. The war factor so cogently urged by the chairman's report must be considered, but I can not grant it the force generally attributed by the majority as furnishing an excuse for every adverse condition which seems to have arisen in the conduct of public affairs. Finally the loss can not be figured less than $43,355,131. But every circumstance would indicate an approximation of the estimate, $91,479,327.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SLOAN. I will yield on the revenue proposition.

Mr. GORDON. Do you think it is a bad thing for the American people to increase our imports of farm products, and would you keep them out just in order to benefit your farmers out in Nebraska?

Mr. SLOAN. I know the gentleman from Cleveland, Ohio, and I know his Democratic view from a large city standpoint, and he thinks it is all right to protect the products of the Cleveland manufacturers, but as for the products of the farmers of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska, he wants them on the free list. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Why, certainly I do.

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly he does. As the spokesman of his party he says so. He is the only one of them talking on that proposition. There is great concern for the Argentinians, the Mexicans, the Canadians, and the Australians, but they care nothing about the farmers of our great Northwest. Well do they say, in the report filed with the Underwood bill—

The future success of our great industries lies beyond the seas.

I here insert a tabulated import and revenue statement of 27 leading northwestern products, 26 being from old Schedule "G" and 1, wool, from "K."

Imports into the United States of certain farm products for two years ending Sept. 30, 1915, under the Underwood tariff law, together with the imports of the same articles for two years ending Sept. 30, 1913, under the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and the per cent of increase or decrease; rates of duties on these articles, either actual or computed ad valorem, under both laws; revenue collected under the Underwood law and the estimated revenue if Payne-Aldrich rates of duty had been collected on imports of these articles of the two years under Underwood law, and loss of revenue.

Articles.	Imports for last two years ending Sept. 30, 1913, under Payne-Aldrich law.		Imports for first two years ending Sept. 30, 1915, under Underwood law.		Per cent of increase or decrease (22).	Rates under Payne-Aldrich law.	Rates under Underwood law.	Estimated revenue, Payne-Aldrich rates of duty applied to imports under Underwood law.	Revenue under Underwood law.	Loss of revenue for two years.

[20] Duty reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent ad valorem.
[21] Practically all free of duty since Dec. 1, 1913, so October and November, 1913, were still under old law.

Think of it! I want to see the future success of our mines, our factories, and our farms well within the borders of this great Republic of ours [applause on the Republican side], so that in time of peace and in time of stress and time of war, no matter what powers may be against us, we shall be self-sufficient and self-sustaining at home. [Applause on the Republican side.] The nation or the statesman that begins to lean upon a foreign trade or a foreign commerce as the first consideration will find itself or himself leaning upon a broken reed in time of stress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I think it is most amusing to hear everything ascribed to the war. Gentlemen say that all the ills that this afflicted Nation has been heir to in the last three years are due to the war. I heard a story recently of a Democratic student at Harvard—I think there are some of them in that institution. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He was being examined, and he was asked to state the binomial theorem. He said that the binomial theorem as he understood it was a quotation from an ancient party platform which meant "let the people rule"; and when the instructor would not accept that, he said, "Well, anyhow that is the definition that will have to go. The European war has destroyed all the others." [Laughter.] Then the man who followed him was asked to state the forty-seventh problem of Euclid he said, "I don't know what it was when the ancient Greek first demonstrated it, but now it means the 'high cost of living,' because our fellows can't solve it." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the story is told down in the good old north State about Mose who owed a local money lender $70 on a note bearing 7 per cent. He came to pay the interest on the note. The money lender said, "Seven times nothin' ain't very much; seven times seven are seventy-seven—$7.70." "Oh, but," said the borrower, "my boy Sam, he's been tendin' college down here at 'Tuxedo,' and he says seben times seben am forty-nine." "Oh, yes," said the money lender, "that used to be so; but you know Mas'r Claude has just been having a big wrestle with that big P—Preparedness—what is a Congressmen from the northeastern States, and Mas'r Claude says this European war has just nachally played smash wif de multipication table, and has made all the figahs a great deal bigga, ceptin' always the figahs in de Treasury." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, in order that the amount in the Treasury may not be further diminished and being in favor of the protection of one of our great, growing northwestern industries, it pleases me greatly to support the eminent gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the magnificent and eloquent leader of the House of Representatives, in voting for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this bill because we once had a sugar factory in operation in Iowa, and the farmers of my great State would like to see it in operation again. This bill proposes to repeal the free-sugar clauses in what is known as Schedule E of the Underwood tariff law. I listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Colorado, and I can say to you that I believe it was a free-trade speech. Free traders have always been students of maxims and not of markets. They have always dealt with theories and not actualities. They have failed to heed the lessons taught by a century of experience with the tariff in this country. They have failed and refused to acknowledge that they are the advocates of an economic creed which is not applicable to the American Continent, with its boundless resources and possibilities.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I can not, for I have only a few minutes time. It is an economic creed which is not conducive to the building up of manufacturing establishments and domestic industrial enterprises; an economic creed that is not in harmony with the spirit of our people, the independence and thrift of our laboring classes, and the genius of our free institutions; an economic creed that is beautiful in conception but unworkable in practice. A creed that finds favor with professors of economics in colleges and universities, but which in practice has been found to be disastrous to the farmer, the wage earner, the artisan, and the manufacturer. [Applause on the Republican side.] An economic creed that has always been detrimental to a safe and sound financial policy for this country from the foundation of the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.] An economic creed that has always given us an empty National Treasury, prostrated the business of the country, brought ruin and failure to thousands of our manufacturing establishments, and poverty and starvation to many of the laboring classes who are directly dependent upon each day's wage to feed, clothe, and maintain those who are dependent upon them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Schedule E of the Underwood tariff law, relating to sugar and molasses, was put into the bill on the theory, as expressed in the Democratic platform, "We recognize that our present tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of this country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry." They also said in their platform, "We appeal to the American people to support us in our demand for a tariff for revenue only."

The great Ways and Means Committee, in making a report to this House, said in substance, "We hope to attain the principles for which we contend by advocating such legislation as will not injure or destroy legitimate industry." By that language they placed their interpretation upon the clauses of the Democratic platform.

Is the beet industry of this country a legitimate industry? Let 112,000 farmers and planters and their families answer that question. Let the working men who are engaged in the operation of these factories answer that question. Let the citizens of 16 States where the beet factories are located answer that question. Let a majority of the American people answer that question in the days that are to come. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Has the beet-sugar industry in this country been injured by Schedule E of the Underwood tariff bill, since it went into effect? Has the threat of free sugar injured that great industry? Let the owners and operators of factories that have closed down answer it. Let thousands of beet farmers and planters who have been financially injured answer it. Instead of the beet industry in this country being injured, instead of its being destroyed, it should be extended and developed. Instead of Iowa having but one beet factory, and that factory not in operation, we should have at least a dozen factories. [Applause on the Republican side.] Instead of having 77 beet factories in the United States, we should at least have 300 or 400 beet factories. [Applause on the Republican side.] Instead of 112,000 farmers and planters being engaged in the raising of beets in this country, we should have at least 600,000 of them. Instead of this country producing something like 600,000 or 700,000 tons of beet sugar annually, we should produce at least 3,000,000 tons annually. Instead of this country having in cultivation something like 525,000 acres of beets, we should have at least 2,500,000 acres of beets. Instead of this country producing something like 15 or 20 per cent of the sugar that we consume, we should produce enough to meet all demands. [Applause on the Republican side.] And then the price of sugar would take care of itself. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is estimated that we have something like 250,000,000 acres of land in this country that are adapted to the raising of beets. We have the soil, we have the climate, we have the men; and I want to say to the gentlemen of the House to-day that this is not an idle dream, for I believe that it can all be accomplished under the beneficent influence of a protective tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This bill to-day may be termed harmony legislation, but sometimes the word "harmony" is a delusive word. I take it that the Democrats want this legislation because they must have revenue. Because by passing this bill it will mean that the Government will continue to receive revenue to the extent of about forty-four millions annually.

In this hour of necessity they have forgotten their old-time arguments. Theory to-day lies prostrate before the indubitable facts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Under leave granted to extend his remarks in the RECORD, Mr. SWEET adds the following:

The Republicans want it so that the great beet industry of this country may be protected, may be saved until the Republican Party once more assumes the administration of the affairs of this Government. That the beet-sugar industry may be saved until such time as the Congress of the United States may give the country an effective nonpartisan tariff commission.

When Schedule E was put into the Underwood law it was a contest between the sugar refineries and the sugar-beet growers, and the refineries won out. Whether the part of Schedule E that will remain if this bill becomes a law will come under the head of being a tariff for revenue only I can not say. Whether it will come under the designation of being a protective tariff or low tariff on sugar and molasses I can not say. But I do know that it will be better than free sugar. I know that it will be better than free trade.

When we take into consideration that the beet industry is a legitimate industry; when we take into consideration that with free sugar struck out of Schedule E of the Underwood tariff law this Government will continue to receive forty-four millions annually from the tariff on sugar and molasses only; when we take into consideration that the Democratic Party had a clause in its platform to the effect, "We appeal to the American people to support us in our demand for a tariff for revenue only."

When we take into consideration that free sugar would injure and destroy the beet industry in this country; when we take into consideration that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the Sixty-third Congress was not enthusiastically in favor of the free-sugar clauses in the bill that bears his name; when we take into consideration that the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is in favor of this bill; when we take into consideration that the President in his message to this Congress, in December last, recommended that the free-sugar clause should not become operative, I do not believe that it can be consistently said that Schedule E as a whole as found in the Underwood tariff law is even good Democratic doctrine.

If the free-sugar clauses in Schedule E are not repealed, the beet-sugar industry will be totally destroyed, and the sugar refineries of this country will have the sugar market absolutely to themselves.

The cane-sugar industry will be paralyzed.

The consumer will not be benefited by the reduction in the price of sugar when the refineries dictate the price and monopolize the American sugar market.

Has the Underwood tariff bill produced sufficient revenue?

Let the present condition of the United States Treasury, as shown by a Democratic Treasurer, answer that question. Let a stamp tax in times of peace answer it. Let the acts of the present Congress in reenacting the so-called stamp tax answer it. Let the recommendations of the President of the United States in his message to this Congress, proposing a stamp tax on bank checks and gasoline, answer it. Let the revenue that this Government has lost by the enactment of Schedule E in the Underwood tariff law answer it.

Let the demoralized condition of the Nation's finances generally under the present administration answer it.

The Ways and Means Committee, in the majority report that accompanied the Underwood tariff bill, under the head of "sugar," said:

> The action of the committee with regard to sugar shows an appreciation of the commercial conditions involved and the committee's desire to respond to the public demands for free sugar.

Is the bill that we are now considering for the repeal of the free-sugar clauses due to the committee's desire to respond to the public demand for free sugar?

If Schedule E was put into the Underwood bill at the demand of the people, are the free-sugar clauses being taken out at the demand of the people?

Has the voice of public opinion become so loud that the committee knows what the people want without holding extended hearings?

Is the Ways and Means Committee, upon the recommendations of the President, doing it to accommodate the Republicans?

Let 50 years of opposition and denunciation of a protective tariff by the Democratic Party answer it. Let the tariff tinkering of the Sixty-third Congress answer it.

Have all the Members of the Democratic Party in the House observed the signs of the times?

As late as February 26, 1915, we find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-third Congress, third session, on page 5366, the following statement, which was made by a prominent Democrat of this House, to wit:

> As the Members of this House know, the Underwood tariff bill reduced the tariff on sugar 25 per cent and provided that sugar should be placed on the free list on May 1, 1916.
> I take it that no Democratic Congress will attempt to repeal the sugar schedule of the Underwood bill.

Notwithstanding this bold assertion, a little over a year from the date of its utterance a Democratic Congress on its own motion, at the recommendation of a Democratic President, without extended hearings of the Ways and Means Committee, propose to do that very thing.

The present bill before the House is a confession that the Underwood tariff law is not a success as a revenue producer. It is a confession that they misinterpreted the demands of the people when a majority of the members of the Ways and Means Committee said in their report to Congress that Schedule E was put in the Underwood tariff bill upon the demands of the people. It is a confession that they were wrong when they said that a reduction of the tariff on sugar would reduce the price to the consumer.

It is a confession that the sugar refineries of this country wielded more influence with the Democratic Party than the sugar-beet growers.

It is a confession that the beet-sugar industry is a legitimate industry. It is a confession that the beet industry of this country has been injured by the Underwood tariff law, with its threat of free trade for sugar and molasses.

It is a confession that a protective tariff is better than a low tariff or free trade.

It is a confession that $44,000,000 annually at this time would be very helpful to the Government to meet the expenses of the present administration.

It is a confession that the Underwood tariff law with its wholesale reduction of duties was formulated upon inadequate information, and was conceived in ignorance of the business and agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the excuse urged in behalf of the proposed inglorious abandonment of one of the most salutary and popular provisions of the Underwood tariff is not a valid one. It is true that the Treasury is in a depleted condition. It is true that the great European war has cut off large volumes of ordinary revenue. But it is also true that we have gone on spending money with a lavish hand. This we should not have done. We should in fact have cut our garment according to the cloth. Our expenditures should have been brought down in proportion to the decline in Treasury receipts. This would have been the course followed by any prudent business concern. And this is the course I have ventured to urge from the very beginning.

In fact, early in 1913, soon after President Wilson took office, I had occasion to remind this House, and, as far as I could, the country, of one very vital plank in the Baltimore platform, that pledging the Democratic Party to rigid economy in expenditures. No such economy has obtained. On the contrary, expenditures have been more lavish than ever before. In many directions they have exceeded all previous records, and in the direction of military and naval expansion they have outrun what would have been considered profligate, and would have been very properly denounced as such under Mr. Taft or Mr. Roosevelt. To my mind Democratic extravagance is quite as reprehensible as, nay, it is even more reprehensible than Republican extravagance, for Republicans have made few professions on this score, while economy has been a watchword of Democracy since the days of Thomas Jefferson. That this watchword should have lost its meaning in these later days is not reassuring to those of us who still honor the sage of Monticello and still believe in the undying principles upon which he founded the party that stands for the common people.

There would be no occasion for the retention of the tax on sugar if decent economy were practiced in carrying on the affairs of government. Even with the depleted revenues under European war conditions, all the ordinary needs might readily have been met. But it was impossible to carry forward a greatly augmented military and naval program without resort to fresh sources of income, to stamp taxes, first, and then to a continuance of the tax on the poor man's breakfast table. To my mind, even the odious stamp tax is less odious than the tax on sugar, for the latter is a concealed tax, while the stamp tax is open and aboveboard; those who pay it know when they pay and what they pay. But the sugar tax is paid without the victim's knowledge, either of the time or the amount.

Let us examine this sugar tax for a moment. It reaches into every home. It bears as heavily on the miner as on the millionaire. John D. Rockefeller will perhaps consume no greater quantity of sugar than the charwoman who scrubs your floor. Yet, in proportion to her income, the charwoman will pay ten thousand times as much of the sugar tax as the Standard Oil king. And this runs true all down the line. The sugar tax, a tax on consumption, bears infinitely heavier on the poor than on the rich. Of all the consumption taxes it is perhaps the very worst, the least defensible on any ground save that of plucking the goose with the least amount of squawking.

I hope there are Democrats on this floor who took their campaigns in 1912 and 1914 as seriously as I took mine. In the earlier one I made pledges to my people on behalf of the Democratic Party which that party faithfully fulfilled in the Underwood tariff. That tariff did not measure up to my hopes, but it marked a very long step in the right direction, and I was able to go before my people in 1914 with the testimony of a pledge fulfilled, of a promise kept. My party had said it would reduce the cost of living; and here, with sugar already cheaper than it had been before in a generation, was the earnest of the other things which certainly would have been realized but for the outbreak of the mighty conflagration across the water. The big bag of sugar which we had promised in 1912 was brought home to the housewife in the early part of 1914. All the other reductions would have come in due course if war had not obtruded its horrid head upon a scene that up to that time was glowing with promise.

If there were not better ways to procure revenue than that of piling burdens upon the poor, and if there were not a more reasonable resort in this alleged emergency than the one to which we are proposing to turn, I would not think of interposing my objection to this bill, except on the ground before indicated. But there are better ways. And, Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out one of them in a bill now before the Committee on Ways and Means. It is my thought that if additional revenues must be had in order to satisfy the cormorant clamors of the militarists these should be drawn from great incomes, through a supertax thereon. The demand for increased appropriations for Army and Navy has not come from the toilers of this land; it has not come from the farmer and the mechanic; it has not come from the mill hand and the day laborer. It has come from those with something to sell—from the war traffickers, from the munition makers, from the gun founders, from the armor-plate manufacturers, from the army contractors, and from the bankers who finance the great transactions which militarism involves. And upon these we should call for the support of the program. It is their program; not that of the plain people. It is they who expect to profit; not the toiler at the forge or in the field. There can be nothing in all this preparation for the producer of wealth. It merely means at the very best that his road is to be made harder, his burden heavier, his outlook less pleasing. But if we put this program through, as we are asked and expected to do and as this bill is designed to forward, rich gains will pour into the coffers of the war traffickers. War brides will continue to bloom and blossom. War babies will continue to crow. Bethlehem Steel, Du Pont Powder, and General Electric will go on flourishing. And Wall Street will magnify its tremendous powers.

Why not turn to those who shall profit out of this proposed program rather than to those who in any case must be the worse for its fulfillment? Why pile more upon the stooped shoulders of the man in mill and mine? Why ask the farmer and the artisan to float battleships on their modest cup of coffee? Why ask the hod carrier to carry also a machine gun on his shoulder as he toils up the ladder? Why ask the scrub woman to supply a submarine as well as the rags with which she plies her hard vocation? This is what you are asking her and them to do. For it is the scrub woman, the hod carrier, the farmer, and the artisan who, in the aggregate, will pay these millions into the Federal Treasury, in addition to the millions which by reason of the tax will flow into the deep coffers of the Sugar Trust. Do not mistake the fact, nor let yourselves for one moment forget that the truth will find you out. Already the Sugar Trust is anticipating the gratuity which it is proposed to confer upon it. For no sooner had it become apparent that a measure such as the one under consideration was to find favor than this most insolent of all the trusts marked up the price of sugar to the consumers of the land; and within recent months it has pulled down millions of dollars from the American people over and above what it would have taken but for the prospect which is now about to be realized.

I want to protest with all my might against the betrayal of Democratic pledges, and plain speaking compels this characterization. It is nothing less than a betrayal of the pledges we made in 1912 and boasted the fulfillment of in 1914. And we are doing it at the behest of the Navy League of the United States, because the National Security League demands it, because the New York organs of big business have created a war scare seems to justify it, because we have not the consistency and the courage to deny the necessity for any such step. Why not curtail expenses rather than run them to new high levels? Why not remember our pledges of economy? Why not say to the war traffickers that this country belongs to the people and not to the patriots for profit? By cutting out even a small segment of the huge program which has been urged upon us we can keep expenditures within the limits of revenue receipts and avoid this backward step, this step which Republicans will hail with delight and over which the devils of protection will rejoice.

For here is the beginning of the end. If we go backward now, there will be no more going forward. Already we are hearing of a "scientific" tariff—of a tariff framed by "experts"—of a tariff "removed from politics." Bah! Is not that the same sort of tariff Mr. Roosevelt told us of, the same sort that our Republican friends sought to popularize, with disastrous results? Did the Republicans succeed in fooling the country? And if they did not, can we hope to succeed where these failed? Has the Democratic Party ever in all its history got anywhere except by straightforward methods? Can any party of the people ever get anywhere save by following a clear course and keeping faith?

We are not pursuing a straight course; we are not keeping faith in this business. We are reversing our position, we are going backward, we are apologizing, seeking to extenuate, undertaking to make the country believe that necessity alone is driving us to the course we have chosen. Yet we know and the country must know that necessity is doing no such thing. Our revenues are depleted—yes—but our appropriations have not been cut a penny. Instead, extravagance is flourishing unchecked. We are ready to plunge the Nation into a very saturnalia of profligate expenditure at the behest of swashbuckling patriots who dream of world power and tremble in their shoes when they confront the monsters of their own imaginings. With even ordinary prudence we might bring expenditures within the limits of income. But, no; we must add thousands to our Army; we must multiply fighting ships; we must subvert industry to the business of destruction or preparing for destruction; we must imitate the stupid powers which are now wallowing in their own blood; we must slip back into the era of claw and fang and substitute the teachings of the War College for those of the Man of Nazareth.

Mr. Chairman, it grieves me to stand in opposition to my party in this matter. But it is easier for me to be in opposition to my party than it is to violate my own conscience and the historic teachings of that party. It was a proud day for me when I stood upon this floor and fought with my brother Democrats to keep the pledges of the Baltimore convention. It was a proud day when I was able to say to my people at home that we of the Democratic Party had kept the faith and had delivered the thing we had promised. But shall I now face about and help to undo the good work and to take back the promised boon? I can not do it. I can not make so light of my given word. I can not so cavalierly reach out and take back the gift which I helped bestow upon the plain people of this land when I voted to drag the Sugar Trust from their backs. I do not say what other Democrats should do. I say only that, as for myself, I shall remain loyal to the pledge given and stand true to the people who have trusted us on account of that pledge.

And, finally, Mr. Chairman—

> Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
> Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
> Given to redeem the human mind from error,
> There were no need of arsenals and forts.

[Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I did not intend to take any time whatever in the discussion of this measure. I take the floor to-night for a definite and particular purpose, which will appear to you in a moment or two. The remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], who opened this debate, however, compel me to make a preliminary statement, and the report made upon this bill emphasizes that necessity. I am for this bill, and I hope that every Republican will vote for it, and I would be glad to see every Democrat vote for it also. The Treasury needs the money and needs it badly. I do not believe there is a Member of this House, in the face of the exigencies that confront this country, who is ready to stand and quibble as to how the money shall be raised, but, first of all, he will show his patriotism and raise it and then criticize the methods used in the next campaign if he chooses to do so. [Applause.] That is the doctrine upon which I stand, not only with reference to this bill but with reference to all supplementary revenue measures, and the leader of the Democratic side will find me occupying that position during the remainder of this session whenever he can demonstrate that the exigency exists.

What is the exigency which now confronts us? When the Republicans went out of power on the 3d of March, 1913, there were $149,000,000 in cash in the Treasury. On the 4th of March, 1916, figuring the daily reports in the same way that they were figured in 1913, there were $44,000,000 in the Treasury. One hundred and five millions of cash has gone. That may be accounted for in one way or another way, but taking the "available funds" in the Treasury, we left you gentlemen with $80,000,000 and you have $16,000,000 left, provided you figure your bank-note retirement fund, as we figured ours. Striking out both, and both ought to go out, we left $58,000,000 "available funds," which we turned over to you three years ago, and on the 4th of March this year the available funds of the Treasury are overdrawn by $5,857,545.47. I am not going to be the man to stand and say that we will not make your deficit good. I will do it with great gladness, believing it is my patriotic duty to do so. You need not have taken this method of doing it, however. I congratulate you that you did, because this is a protective measure. You could have raised twice the money by the purely revenue proposition of putting a duty on tea and coffee and no ultimate consumer would have ever paid one cent of increased cost, but I am glad to see you take this means, and I stand for it. I hope every Republican and every Democrat in the House will vote to pass this bill and that we may vote together at least on one thing.

A few moments ago a Member said to me, "Is the Democratic Party coming to us or are we going to them?" I said to him, "I think the movement is both ways," and I honestly do think it is both ways. The purpose for which I take the floor now, reserving the other matters until you bring in your great revenue measure, is to give you the latest account of what is going on somewhere else in the world besides the United States. I want to quote with some freedom from a wonderful article written last week in the Economic World, of New York, on "The Swing of Great Britain to Protective Tariff," and, gentlemen of the Democratic side, you are coming to us, whether you know it or not, and we are going to you, whether we know it or not. The world is moving, it is moving on both sides of the political lines, and we are going to get together by and by when the tariff commission which we both now advocate brings us nearer to decisions on all these questions which will be based on an intelligent investigation of actual, living facts, and when moss-covered theories have been discarded. Pardon me while I give you some extracts now from this great article written by a free trader in the Economic World. I will insert the whole of it in the RECORD:

> The cabled accounts of the great meeting of the British Association of Chambers of Commerce, held in London this week, have been of necessity almost aggravatingly brief, disconnected, and insufficient to convey an adequate idea of the deliberations.

The thinking part of the British public seems to have followed what was said and done with the most intense interest, realizing that the outcome of the meeting might well be the determination, at least in a preliminary sense, of the course which Great Britain will take after the European war is over in respect of the matter which will most universally and most fundamentally affect the daily lives of all British subjects, namely, the adaptation of the conditions under which British industry and trade are carried on, to the changed posture of the world's affairs resulting from the war.

And I want to call attention to the fact that when Great Britain adopted her free-trade policy she had had many years of peace and she has had no great war until now since that policy was adopted. She has had no war great enough to test her resources at home. I do not include as one of the great wars of the world the conquering of the Boer Republic, but the Napoleonic wars were the last which tested the national strength and resources of Great Britain. Now, how is she going to meet the test?

After a century of freedom to do virtually what it would with regard to its economic policies and to frame those policies solely from the point of view of the immediate interests of the various classes of the domestic population, the British people has had it brought home to it by the events of the past year and a half that a conditio sine qua non of continued national prosperity and even the permanent national existence may be a reformation of those policies to the end that uniform vigor and effectiveness may be maintained throughout the entire economic and social body—to the end that uniform vigor and effectiveness may be maintained throughout the entire economic and social body, that impairments here and there by reason of excessive dependence upon the good will of other and naturally rival nations may be prevented, and that all the powers and resources of the Empire be kept efficient and available for the coming international competition in trade, hardly less bitter than the war itself, which is foreseen.

Now, what did they do? Skipping along, I come to the point where the British Chamber of Commerce recently met, composed of a thousand members, the greatest economic and industrial gathering that ever was held in the British Empire—

The first resolution discussed and unanimously adopted by the association clearly revealed what was in the minds of an overwhelming majority of the attending representatives of British industry and trade. It runs thus:

"The experience of the war has shown that the strength and safety of the British Nation in time of national peril lie in the possession by this nation of the power to produce its requirements from its own soil and factories rather than in the possession of values which may be exported and exchanged for the products and manufactures of foreign countries."

What is that but the protective system boiled down to an essence? It is the protective doctrine which the Republican Party has been teaching for 50 years, and the greatest industrial body of Great Britain deliberately commits itself to that policy, and, gentlemen, unthinkingly you commit yourselves to this policy, in which I happily and gladly join with you, when you adopt a protective measure to raise revenue when you might have raised it otherwise. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I read:

In the same sense, though not with the same clear disclosure of a new national economic policy decisively arrived at, Mr. McKenna, the chancellor of the exchequer, said in the course of his address to the meeting:

"We have seen a nation which in time of profound peace deliberately planned, prepared, and provoked war, and we have found ourselves dependent upon that nation for many articles of our own trade. I do not think that, as a nation, we should ever allow ourselves to be placed in that position again. There is an issue which once divided the nation and on which the opinion of most of us probably remains unchanged. But it does not follow because we stand now as we stood before that there is not a very large field for common agreement among us."

And I say to you as Republicans and to you as Democrats, there is a large field for common agreement on this question between us here in this country to-day.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; if I have time.

Mr. GORDON. In view of that statement that you have just read, sir, is that pronouncement of the British Board of Trade any more than a declaration of economic war?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman must form his own opinion as to what it is. I have mine. [Laughter.]

What these discussions and proceedings, in so far as we on this side of the Atlantic have them, bring out is that the predominant thought in the assemblage was the all-around fortification of the economic life of the British Nation, the effective and harmonious development of all the departments of this economic life, and the adoption of such policies as are requisite to bring about a condition of national independence in an economic sense, in place of the partial dependence hitherto accepted without serious demur.

The time has come when I should ordinarily close. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] cited the fact, which I can not dispute at this moment, that we received more income from customs for the first seven months of the year 1914 than we did for the first seven months of the year 1913. I do not know how that may be, but I will find out to-morrow morning. I say to him that, if we did, it was because there were $122,000,000 of importations more during those seven months of 1914 than there were in 1913, and that displaced the work of American men and women just to that extent. And I am not willing, as a Republican and as a protectionist in every fiber of my being, to produce revenue at the expense of the American home. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HILL. If I have the time.

Mr. SIMS. I want to know whether, if we had a tariff commission now in operation, the gentleman would be in favor of referring this bill to that commission for report before he voted on it?

Mr. HILL. I am perfectly willing to refer any economic question to any fair-minded tariff commission. Three years ago I started to make a bill in accordance with the report of a tariff commission. I had detailed to my assistance a free trader, a man who stood for revenue only, a professor in a Virginia college, and a Republican. I said to them, "Gentlemen we have but one task to perform. The facts are before us in that report. I do not know what they are. The tariff commission reported them. We can agree as fair-minded men whether we make our bill in accordance with the facts or in accordance with our previous inclinations." And we agreed upon it; and when we got through, after six weeks' work, locked up by ourselves, we voted, Democrats, Republicans, and free traders, and everything, unanimously, that we had accomplished our task in accordance with the facts that were placed before us.

Mr. GORDON. Then the people threw you out?

Mr. HILL. That has nothing to do with it. I might retort by saying something which I will not say now.

I ask permission to attach to my remarks the entire article from which I have quoted.

The article is as follows:

THE SWING OF GREAT BRITAIN TO A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

The cabled accounts of the great meeting of the British Association of Chambers of Commerce, held in London this week, have been of necessity almost aggravatingly brief, disconnected, and insufficient to convey an adequate idea of the deliberations. It is known that never before in the history of the association has one of its meetings been so largely attended, the delegates being over 1,000 in number and representing every considerable commercial and industrial organization in the British Isles proper, to say nothing of many similar bodies in the outlying parts of the Empire. The British Government itself was represented by Mr. Reginald McKenna, chancellor of the exchequer, and representatives of the governments of many of the British colonies were also present. The thinking part of the British public seems to have followed what was said and done with the most intense interest, realizing that the outcome of the meeting might well be the determination, at least in a preliminary sense, of the course which Great Britain will take, after the European war is over, in respect of the matter which will most universally and most fundamentally affect the daily lives of all British subjects, namely, the adaptation of the conditions under which British industry and trade are carried on, to the changed posture of the world's affairs resulting from the war. After a century of freedom to do virtually what it would with regard to its economic policies and to frame those policies solely from the point of view of the immediate interests of the various classes of the domestic population, the British people has had it brought home to it by the events of the past year and a half that a conditio sine qua non of continued national prosperity and even of permanent national existence may be a reformulation of those policies to the end that uniform vigor and effectiveness may be maintained throughout the entire economic and social body; that impairments here and there by reason of excessive dependence upon the good will of other and naturally rival nations may be prevented; and that all the powers and resources of the Empire may be kept efficient and available for the coming international competition in trade, hardly less bitter than the war itself, which is foreseen. It is an obvious fact that the conception of a Great Britain always able to obtain whatever she requires from any part of the globe, because of her wealth and the far-flung ramifications of her commerce, on the one hand, and because of the security of access to all lands afforded by her fleet, on the other, has of late lost no little of its former potency with the British mind. The harsh experiences and lessons of the war have thrown a doubt upon its absolute correctness and sufficiency. Even though Great Britain and her allies should achieve decisive success in the present struggle—as, indeed, they confidently expect to do—it is felt that far-reaching readjustments to world facts hitherto not clearly perceived will be imperatively called for. And the proceedings of the meeting of the British Association of Chambers of Commerce have been eagerly watched by all of Great Britain as probably indicating the conclusions the national mind was coming to in this all-important matter.

The first resolution discussed and unanimously adopted by the association clearly reveals what was in the minds of an overwhelming majority of the attending representatives of British industry and trade. It runs thus:

"The experience of the war has shown that the strength and safety of the British Nation in time of national peril lies in the possession by this nation of the power to produce its requirements from its own soil and factories, rather than in the possession of values which may be exported and exchanged for the products and manufactures of foreign countries."

In the same sense, though not with the same clear disclosure of a new national economic policy decisively arrived at, Mr. McKenna, the chancellor of the exchequer, said in the course of his address to the meeting:

"We have seen a nation which in time of profound peace deliberately planned, prepared, and provoked war, and we have found ourselves dependent upon that nation for many articles of our own trade. I do not think that as a nation we shall ever allow ourselves to be placed in that position again. There is an issue which once divided the nation and on which the opinion of most of us probably remains unchanged; but it does not follow, because we stand now as we stood before, that there is not a very large field for common agreement among us. Because trade is free, it does not follow that the Government should not assist our traders, and we are prepared to give the assistance of the Government to the development of foreign trade in order that it may no longer be controlled by our enemies."

While the latter part of these remarks of Mr. McKenna may be taken to mean that, speaking for the present Liberal Government of Great Britain, he was not ready to admit the necessity or the probability of a complete departure from the national policy of free trade, some such departure is obviously implied by his earlier sentences. A perhaps more striking fact, however, is that the general discussions and proceedings of the meeting as a whole display small solicitude for the preservation, as sacrosanct, of the traditional free-trade policy of Great Britain, with all its ultimate implications. What these discussion and proceedings, in so far as we on this side of the Atlantic have them, bring out is that the predominant thought in the assemblage was the all-around fortification of the economic life of the British Nation, the effective and harmonious development of all the departments of this economic life, and the adoption of such policies as are requisite to bring about a condition of national independence in an economic sense, in place of the partial dependence hitherto accepted without serious demur. As regards the pure doctrine of free trade, the thinking and speaking of the gathered representatives of British industry and trade seemed to treat it as of secondary importance. The champion of it à outrance were for the most part distinguished rather by their silence than by their protestations. And though there was certainly no general expressed repudiation of it, yet for the first time in two generations it was dealt with as something to be accommodated to other and more essential policies, rather than as in itself an overriding policy, in harmony with which all else must somehow be brought.

Illustrative of the attitude of mind just described was the resolution, adopted by the meeting with practical unanimity, urging provision, "first, for preferential trading relations between all British countries; second, for reciprocal trading relations between the British Empire and allied countries; third, for favorable treatment of neutral countries; fourth, for restriction by tariffs and otherwise on all trade relations with enemy countries, so as to make it impossible to return to prewar conditions." But perhaps more significant still was the adoption, in a modified form, of a resolution offered by the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, urging straight-out "protection" of British industries. This was changed so as to read that the Government should take steps "to foster and safeguard" the nation's commerce and industry; but thus amended it was accepted by the meeting with hardly a dozen dissenting votes. At only a single important resolution calling for governmental limitation of the freedom of trade did the meeting balk—one pressed by the delegates from Bradford, advocating absolute prohibition of dealings with Germany, now and after the war. This was rejected by the association; but press dispatches received from England during the past two or three days appear to indicate that the leaders of British trade, perhaps in the present heat of their anger, are ready to go even to this length and are seriously urging this policy upon the British Government.

It is unnecessary to remark that the tendencies of British thinking displayed at the great meeting of representatives of the foremost economic organizations of the nation mark a change of the profoundest kind, and one which, if realized in anything like its totality, must have the most far-reaching effects throughout the civilized world. For all of us now living British free trade has seemed to have an immemorial and changeless quality; to be, so to speak, a fact in nature, permanent as the very hills; to have so deep-sunk a foundation in the British national character and circumstances as to afford a calculable point d'appui for the economic departures of the rest of the world. To not a few of us, moreover, this absolute free trade has appeared to have an ideal—not to say moral—superiority over every other system. Perceiving that it is implicit in the very theory of tariff protection that some classes in the protected country must carry an economic burden for the benefit of others, which they would not have to bear if trade were free, we have felt that a larger measure of economic justice was attained in Great Britain than was possible in any country allowing itself to be seduced, to a greater or less degree, by the fallacious allurements of protection. Yet now we have to face the fact that what we had held to be unshakably permanent, and confirmed in its permanence by its very quality of ideal justice, gives signs of impermanence. By force majeure the protagonists and exemplars of free trade are being swung away from their long-established national policy and are being brought both to admit and to accept the fact that where the trade of a nation—their nation as well as others—is made absolutely free, certain national objectives of vital importance may fail of attainment, the national life in essential respects may be left incomplete and inadequate, and the national future may be imperiled.

Naturally, it will be said by some—and doubtless with no inconsiderable measure of truth—that too much weight should not be attached to movements of the English mind engendered by the excitements and resentments of a time of national struggle and danger. When the calm of peace returns, it may be urged, a very different view of things will be taken in Great Britain, minds will revert to their customary orbits, and impulses begotten of the animosities of war will cease to sway opinions and policies. Certainly it may be taken for granted that this contention is correct to the extent that fierce rage at an enemy country will not be found in the long run to dominate all British commercial intercourse with that country. When peace comes there will be no impassable Chinese wall between Great Britain and Germany. On the other hand, it seems to us that there is something more than superficial and transitory in such a manner of thinking about the economic requirements of the national life as that to which not only the impassioned but also the cooler minds in England have been brought by reflection upon their country's experiences in this war. So long as the principle of protection was advocated in England by Joseph Chamberlain and his Birmingham constituents, pinched by German competition in their particular fields of industry, or by the landowning class, desirous of restoring its acres to profitable use, the probability of its acceptance by the mass of the British people was not great. Even after nearly three-quarters of a century there is vivid recollection in England's industrial population of the hard conditions and of the bitter struggle that brought about the repeal of the corn laws in 1846. The maxim of the anticorn-law league, to "buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest," has so deeply embedded itself in the British consciousness that more than the advantage of certain classes from a different scheme of things would be required to cause its abandonment. But as all good citizens will submit even to the loss of their lives for the larger good of their country, so public policies will be accepted on grounds of the general advantage, which would unhesitatingly be rejected where the apparent advantage would fall to a part and not to the whole. These are the considerations that lead us to think that the occurrences at the meeting of the British Association of Chambers of Commerce have permanent and not merely temporary significance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for permission to publish the whole of this article.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I make a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, five minutes is a pretty short time, but in that period I can, at least, say thank you for what I hope and expect you are going to do here to-morrow.

I represent, gentlemen, one of the leading beet-sugar producing districts in the United States. I have in my district three large beet-sugar factories. In the years gone by we had in that country great lumber-producing interests. The Saginaw River country was known then as the great lumber-producing district of the United States. It was the district where my friend FORDNEY lives and which he so well represents now. I remember that in those days, at one time, we had a great financial depression in the lumber business. Lumber would not sell, and it was piled up on our docks. As a consequence everyone was hard up. Men could not meet their notes and were sweating blood over their troubles. I recall that at that particular time salt, which we also manufactured as a by-product to the lumber mills, was away up in price, selling for $1.25 a barrel and costing us about 50 cents. So we rolled in a lot of cash because of the salt business, and it helped us in the situation in which we found ourselves because of the stagnant lumber trade. I recall a little couplet that came out in a lumber paper at that time, which ran something like this, and as my friend FORDNEY comes from Saginaw, it is for his benefit that I will give it to you:

I am a backbone lumberman;
Michigan is my nation,
Saginaw is my dwelling place,
And salt is my salvation.

[Laughter.]

Gentlemen, the action you will take here to-morrow, relating, as it will, to this most important industry in my district, will bring salvation and hope to our people and those who are interested in these sugar factories. All the business men of that community will rejoice to know that at last the impending detrimental and damaging legislation is no longer a danger here.

What does it mean to have three large beet-sugar factories in my district? It means, gentlemen, that in the last sugar campaign those three factories sliced on the average 2,700 tons of beets every day, and for the hundred days of the annual campaign they sliced about 270,000 tons of beets. You could see them on the railroad tracks—miles and miles of cars loaded with beets. Those carloads of beets, sliced in those three factories, would fill a train 70 miles long, and the product of those beets would make 32,000 tons of granulated sugar.

What does that mean? We have some great colliers in our naval fleet that carry 10,500 tons of coal at each trip. Enormous, great colliers they are, and still it would take three of those great colliers, enormous as they are, to carry the product of these three great factories in one load. Or, if you will put that sugar into cars, it will load 800 cars, and if you loaded it on one train, you would have 4 miles of cars in one train, carrying this sugar. This is only one-fifth of the beet sugar produced in the 16 factories in Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, last year the farmers supplying these three beet-sugar factories received over $1,600,000 in pay for the beets they raised. The news of the passage of this bill will bring satisfaction to the hearts of all the farmers in my district, and in their behalf and in behalf of the manufacturers and the employees in those factories I want to thank you for what you are going to do to-morrow. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VAN DYKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VAN DYKE] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, first I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, before starting, I wish to state that I am very glad to know that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] thinks that there is at least 1 district out of 435 in this country which this bill will benefit.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand this proposition this matter has been brought before the House not because the Democratic Party believes otherwise than they did when they declared for free sugar, but rather it is because it is supposed to be necessary to continue this tariff as an emergency measure.

It seems that in order to raise funds necessary to run the Government for the next fiscal year and provide for a certain added amount which has been asked for to provide for the so-called "preparedness program" the committee to-day is asking that we retain the tariff on sugar.

I, for one, can not conscientiously vote for this measure, because I believe the principle involved is wrong and, further, because I believe it is not necessary.

At the present time we are collecting somewhere over $40,000,000 per year because of this sugar tariff, but while we are raising that amount of money for the Government we are placing at least an equal amount into the hands of the sugar refiners by so doing.

Every pound of sugar, whether produced in the United States or abroad, whether it pays a tariff duty or not, is sold at a price which includes that tariff duty. Sugar grown 40 miles from my home city—St. Paul, Minn.—is sold to the wholesalers in St. Paul at the same price we would have to pay for sugar grown abroad, imported, and taxed at New York and shipped from there to St. Paul.

Consequently the amount of this tariff is added to every pound of sugar consumed in this country, whether it be grown within the borders of this country or on foreign soil, and the sugar trusts are being allowed to add the price of the tariff on to every pound of sugar which is consumed in this country.

If it is necessary to tax sugar—and I will endeavor to show that it is not necessary—but granted that it is, for the sake of argument, then I believe that a consumers' tax should be placed upon sugar, so that each cent additional which the consumer has to pay will go directly into the Treasury of the United States, and we will not be forced into the position where we will practically become partners of the Sugar Trust and divide the additional cost of sugar with them.

I do not propose, with my voice or vote, to allow this Government to lend itself to the sugar trusts in collecting from the consumers of this country upward of $40,000,000 per year in order that this country might get an equal amount.

The people who have benefited more than any other in this country during the last year because of the very condition which makes it necessary for us at the present time to raise revenues in this extraordinary way are the people who should take care of this deficit created by those conditions.

It is a well-known fact that there is something like $2,000,000,000 worth of listed war-munition contracts with an estimated profit of from 40 to 50 per cent. A 5 per cent tax on $2,000,000,000 or a 10 per cent tax on the estimated profits of these contracts would produce the $100,000,000 worth of "preparedness" revenue asked for by the President and would still leave to these people a larger profit than they have ever enjoyed before. Therefore I submit that the continuing of the sugar tariff is absolutely uncalled for.

Mr. Chairman, in his message to Congress, delivered on this floor December 7 last, the President of the United States, after outlining his program for the national defense, estimated the revenue requirements thus:

> The additional revenues required to carry out the program of military and naval preparation of which I have spoken, would, as at present estimated, be for the fiscal year 1917, $93,800,000.

For the sake of argument we may presume, and the preparedness program already before our committees leads us to conclude, that the additional revenue requirement will be fully $100,000,000. The practical problem before Congress, therefore, is, How may this additional $100,000,000 for national defense be most easily raised and be of least burden to the people of this country?

In other words, how may this Congress provide $100,000,000 of extra military and naval costs with maximum certainty and justice?

In House resolution 113, which I introduced January 29, I specified taxes on war munitions, incomes, and inheritances as proper sources for this additional revenue.

The particular sources of revenue on which I desire to present data at this time is the taxation of munitions of war. Taxation of war munitions as a source of revenue to maintain a program of military and naval preparedness is a proposition which appeals to reason from the following points of view:

First. Because of its eminent justice, on the principle that the benefited interest should bear the cost.

Second. Because of the adequacy of this source of taxable wealth and its ability to pay, the war profits now enjoyed by the munition manufacturers being the most phenomenal, both in volume and in margin of profit, known in modern times.

Third. Because these war profits are tangible, available, and easy to reach.

Fourth. Because taxation of war munitions will not fall upon American labor and the American consumer, or, even in the last analysis, upon American capital, but will be passed on to the European belligerents who purchase the war munitions.

The first point to which I desire to call the attention of Members of this House is the adequacy of war-munition profits, both in volume and profit margin, as a source of taxable income.

VOLUME OF WAR-MUNITION PROFITS.

Although practically all newspapers, financial and industrial journals, and magazines are full of the subject of the unparalleled volume of war-munition business, the high margin of profits, and the phenomenal rise in stock-exchange values of war-munition stocks, perhaps the best-known newspaper authority on this subject, and the one which most nearly meets the title of organ of the war-munition industrials, is the Wall Street Journal.

On Saturday, January 29, 1916, the very day I introduced the resolution before this House, the Wall Street Journal, published by the well-known financial corporation Dow, Jones & Co., printed its list of war orders, being contracts received by manufacturers and not including purchases of raw materials and foodstuffs, as aggregating "over $2,000,000,000 gross"; the great bulk of these orders being for explosives, shells, rifles, shrapnel, submarines, and aeroplanes, and for 1916 delivery.

A list of contracts was given in which 21 companies alone had filed war orders totaling $1,400,000,000, including $300,000,000 of miscellaneous munitions by Bethlehem Steel, $200,000,000 of explosives by Du Pont Powder, $146,000,000 of shrapnel by Canadian Car & Foundry, $143,000,000 of shells and rifles by Baldwin Locomotive, $100,000,000 of marine supplies by Electric Boat, $94,000,000 of rifles and shells by Westinghouse Electric, and $20,000,000 to $50,000,000 of shells and explosives each by Hercules Powder, Ætna Explosives, American Can, American Locomotive, and New York Air Brake.

The Wall Street Journal takes pains to state that the list is far from complete, and does not include the $100,000,000 of arms and munition orders credited to the Remington Arms Co., the $100,000,000 of further contracts known to have been received by the Winchester Arms Co., or the "record sales of shrapnel bars" and other war materials by the United States Steel Corporation, which the Journal names as "one of the leading beneficiaries of European war orders"; nor does the list include $90,000,000 of war contracts credited to Crucible Steel.

The article bears the caption, "War orders aggregate over $2,000,000,000 gross." This fairly indicates the volume of war-munition contracts filed on January 29. Large additional war orders filed since that date materially expand even that tremendous volume.

MARGIN OF PROFIT ON WAR MUNITIONS.

In the leading article of the January number of the Review of Reviews, by J. George Frederick, the margin of profit on war munitions, such as shells and explosives, would appear to be as high as 50 per cent to 100 per cent. The writer quotes smokeless powder as being sold on war contracts at $1 per pound, as against 50 cents as the usual manufacturer's price. The Wall Street Journal, in discussing a $15,000,000 order for smokeless powder received by Ætna Explosives, states that the usual factory cost is 30 to 50 cents, but in some cases reaches 65 cents. A list of shell contracts discussed by Mr. Frederick in the Review of Reviews indicates a profit margin of 50 per cent.

In an article of the Wall Street Journal on February 29, based on the war orders of 26 companies and the increase in the market value of the stocks of these companies, Dow, Jones & Co. report:

War orders for 26 companies	$1,734,500,000
Par value stock of 26 companies	$1,737,389,000
Market value of stock before war	$1,287,658,000
Recent high market price of same	$2,212,986,000
Appreciation in market value	$919,323,000
Appreciation in market price—per cent	71
Appreciation on par value—do	53
Appreciation to war orders—do	53

If the stock-market sales of stocks of these 26 leading war-munition companies is a fair indication of the profits earned, the analysis of the Wall Street Journal would indicate that the profit margin on war orders approximated 53 per cent. Doubtless profits on war munitions, including commissions, run anywhere from 25 per cent up to 100 per cent. The appreciation of 71 per cent in the market value of the stocks of these 26 companies—aggregating $919,000,000 of net appreciation for the group—is doubtless higher than the profit margin realized; but the investors, as shown by their purchases, doubtless reckon upon a profit margin averaging at least 50 per cent.

The above estimate is for 26 companies only. The same article of February 29 states:

War orders of $2,000,000,000 gross, at our lowest estimate, have been received by some 42 companies.

If we apply a profit margin of 50 per cent to the $2,000,000,000 of war-munition contracts cited, we get a total profit on war-munition orders for 1916 delivery amounting to $1,000,000,000. With war orders still being almost daily received, and all prices for war supplies constantly rising in price, it is evident that it would be difficult for Congress to find any other source of revenue so available and so excellently adapted to successful taxation for military and naval preparedness as the unparalleled volume of war-munition profits which Wall Street authorities have so carefully and conscientiously listed for our study and analysis.

It is evident that a 5 per cent tax on the $2,000,000,000 of listed war-munition contracts, or of 10 per cent on the estimated profits of these contracts, would produce the $100,000,000 of preparedness revenue asked for by the President.

If one-half of the required revenue should be raised from an extension of income-tax duties or from income and inheritance taxes, it is apparent that about one-half of the above rates on war munitions would be ample.

It is evident, at least, that the above-named sources of wealth combined should provide adequate means for preparedness without taxation of American consumers upon the necessaries of life by tariff duties or otherwise.

The munition companies themselves should find no cause for opposition to this method of preparedness taxation, because, first, the bulk of the revenue will come back to them in arms and munitions sold the Government, and, second, the balance they can recover in prices of munitions sold to Europe.

EARNINGS OF DU PONT DE NEMOURS POWDER CO.

The gross profits of the so-called "war-bride" industrials, which, on the basis of the above analysis of the Wall Street Journal, appear to approximate 53 per cent, are not, of course, applicable to dividends on the common stock. Interest on the bonds and preferred stock and taxes must first be deducted. The net profits applicable to dividends on the common stock are estimated by the Wall Street authority at 25 per cent to 50 per cent. However, as 6 per cent to 8 per cent is considered a fair dividend margin for most kinds of corporations in normal times, it is plain that the 42 war-munition companies, which earn 25 per cent to 50 per cent net on the common, make fine subjects for preparedness taxation.

There is one type of munition plant, however, which appears to earn far more than the 25 per cent to 50 per cent net profits, and that is the powder mill. The best example of this type is the Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co.

This famous powder company, perhaps the greatest in the world, publishes an analysis of its earnings for the calendar year 1915 in the Wall Street Journal of February 28, 1916. It is interesting to learn that, although this company doubled its common stock in 1915, the earnings on its common stock in 1915—that is to say, upon the doubled issue—was 94.3 per cent.

The net earnings for 1915, even after the necessary adjustments, including amounts written off for construction work for military business, were $57,840,758, as against $5,603,153 in 1914, an increase exceeding tenfold.

The company earned 94.3 per cent net on $58,854,200 of common stock in 1915, as against 13.6 per cent on $29,428,708 of common in 1914.

The assets of Du Pont de Nemours Powder increased from $83,432,445 at the close of 1914 to $258,263,220 at the close of 1915, a gain of over threefold in volume.

As a subject of taxation, therefore, the Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co., I submit to gentlemen of this House, is something ideal. It supplies all the requisites of a perfect taxable subject, to wit: (1) Taxable ability to pay; (2) margin of profit increment; (3) accessibility of taxable income; (4) benefits derived from the purpose for which the revenue is to be expended; and, finally, the ideal principle of equity and justice involved.

For revenue to support the program of military and naval preparedness, where would gentlemen look for an adequate, available, just, and equitable subject for taxation if not to a giant powder corporation, which in a single year doubles its volume of common stock, trebles its assets, and then, after paying all fixed charges and all investments for construction, earns 94.3 per cent on its doubled common stock?

Gentlemen may inquire if I would rob a big powder company of the fruit of the one great war opportunity of its history, which may not come again in a lifetime. Certainly I would not. I would be just to the Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co. I would not take away its 94.3 per cent of net earnings even for a program of military and naval preparedness which will be a direct benefit to its treasury and dividends.

But it would seem to me that this big powder octopus could well afford to spare 10 per cent of its net earnings, and get along with an 84 per cent margin, instead of a 94 per cent margin, when every dollar of the revenue to be expended for military and naval defense is directly in line with the expansion and profits of its business.

In 1914 Du Pont Powder was doing well on a margin of 13.6 per cent net on $28,000,000 of common stock, which is much better than the average industrial realizes. If, out of its 94.3 per cent on $58,000,000 of common, in 1915, it spared 10 per cent for Federal revenue, the remaining 84 per cent margin is not so low as to justify any feeling on its part that it is being robbed.

Its prospects for 1916 earnings appear even brighter than for 1915. In its volume of contracts for 1916, as listed on January 29, the total is given by the Wall Street Journal as $300,000,000. But only 30 days later, on February 29, the same authority quotes the war orders on hand at $400,000,000. As about one-half of the sales price as now quoted represents profits, the gross profits in sight for this company, on the basis of contracts already received, should approximate this year $200,000,000. It would seem as though Du Pont Powder could well afford to appropriate 10 per cent of this offhand for preparedness educational purposes and then be no great sufferer to an extent that anybody would notice. Certainly it should be the last company in America to complain of a war-munitions tax for preparedness purposes.

PREPAREDNESS REVENUE LEVIED IN GERMANY.

The proposition which I have laid before this House for raising preparedness revenue is not a novelty. It is the approved method of raising war revenue now enforced in every belligerent nation in Europe. All the countries at war are levying taxes upon war profits. Practically all the neutrals of the world likewise are levying upon profits derived from war supplies to maintain their preparedness programs.

To avoid too great length in going into this subject let us take what is admittedly the greatest nation for military preparedness in the world or perhaps in the history of man—let us take the present revenue program of the German Imperial Government.

The daily press of February 27 last contains a synopsis of the German war-profits tax which is now being levied, from which allow me to quote, as published in the Sunday Star, Washington, D. C.:

The corporation tax on war-time profits starts with 10 per cent on the additional yearly profits made during the war as compared with the average ante bellum profits when this additional profit does not exceed 20 per cent of the corporation's capital stock. It rises to 30 per cent when the additional profits exceed 20 per cent of the capital.

Real "war babies" with heavy war profits are further hit by a provision increasing the rate of taxation when the actual lot of increased profits exceeds 10 per cent of the capital stock. This entails a 10 per cent surcharge, rising in graduated stages to 50 per cent additional when the company is in a position to declare profits of 30 per cent.

It is apparent that our friends, the Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co., which is entitled to a blue ribbon in the class described as "real war baby," is in great luck from the fact that it resides in America instead of in belligerent Europe, where "real war babies" have to pay real war taxes.

The class of "war babies" which pays the maximum rate of taxation in Germany is the class which declares only 30 per cent profits, while our powder octopus declares 94 per cent. This class in Germany pays into the imperial treasury 50 per cent of the increase in war profits over ante bellum profits.

Du Pont de Nemours's net earnings on the common stock in 1915 were 94.3 per cent, as against 13.6 per cent in 1914. In actual earnings, as shown in the report, the net, after all necessary adjustments, including amounts written off for construction work, was $57,840,758 in 1915, as compared with $5,603,153 in 1914.

The taxable increase in 1915 war profits over 1914 ante bellum profits therefore exceeded $52,000,000; and the German maximum rate applicable to this increase, namely, 50 per cent, would realize $26,000,000 of preparedness revenue on last year's business.

The application of the German preparedness tax rate to Du Pont de Nemours alone accordingly would produce over 25 per cent of all the revenue which the President requires for his preparedness program for the year ending June 30, 1917. It is evident that one-fourth to one-half of the German rate applied to the entire 42 war-munition corporations reported by the Wall Street Journal would take care of any preparedness program which Congress and the American people are likely to set in motion.

It is apparent that one reason why preparedness tax rates are so high in Germany is that the margin of war profits is far lower. The German Imperial Government apparently does not stand for prices and profit margins such as prevail on war supplies in this country. Their tax law indicates that war profits are supposed to range about 10 per cent to 30 per cent as a maximum. Such a thing as a corporation earning 94.3 per cent on its common stock is a phenomenon probably unknown in the German Empire. You will find in Germany no war stocks which have risen from 40 up to 470 and no bunch of 26 companies whose common shares have appreciated 71 per cent, or $900,000,000 net, in market value in a year.

The shares of stock represented at the recent Gary-Roosevelt dinner, just before Christmas, in New York—a dinner apparently called in protest against the President's proposed taxes on oil and steel—have appreciated since 1914 approximately $1,200,000,000.

The total brood of "real war babies" in this country has realized an appreciation of $1,500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 in market price of its stocks and bonds during the past 18 months of war.

Such a splendid display of increased "war baby" increment would afford Federal revenue even for the $500,000,000 preparedness program which Col. Roosevelt feels would be about right.

The $100,000,000 program which President Wilson outlines in his message is denounced by the doughty colonel as mere "milk and water." At the Gary dinner the colonel had seen the program of "oil and steel," which in his mind was apparently the real thing.

The effect of the President's message in declaring for the taxation of oil and steel appears to have been to unite the oil and steel interests, the two opposing dominant factions in the financial machinery of the Republican Party. Steel and Standard Oil, Morgan and Rockefeller, Hill and Harriman, Taft and Roosevelt, elephant and bull moose, were united at Chairman Gary's board for the first time in years, and all because of the proposition to place oil and steel on the same tax list to meet the expense of the preparedness for which they shouted and from which they expect rich dividends.

The wealth of the United States, which is greater than estimated for the German Empire and the British Empire combined, was placed in 1912 at $180,000,000,000, a very substantial fraction of which was represented at the Gary-Roosevelt dinner.

The iron and steel production of the United States Steel Corporation alone is greater than that of either the German or the British Empire.

The oil production of the constituent companies of Standard Oil is greater than that of all Europe.

When the banks which represent these interests are well able to loan $500,000,000 to one of the belligerent interests in the European war, it would not appear exorbitant that they should be called upon to contribute $100,000,000 to a preparedness program which in the end will redound more largely to their business interests than anyone else.

But the function of the oil and steel interests, as seen by their Wall Street directors, is not to pay taxes, but levy taxes. They have levied an increase of 50 per cent in the average price of all their products during the past year upon the American people and upon the world.

The net result is shown in their enormous present earnings and the vast increase in the price of their stocks. The market value both of the United States Steel securities and of the Standard Oil securities increased during the past calendar year over $600,000,000, or $1,200,000,000 for the combined "oil and steel" interests, which our colonel considers superior to "milk and water."

These interests and all their organs and political agents are shouting for the largest measure of military and naval preparedness.

House resolution 113, which I have introduced, will serve as a test of the question whether such interests are for preparedness for the public interest or for private interest—for patriotism or for revenue. If for patriotism, they will not oppose the plan to enable them to bear their just lion's share of the taxes which are eventually to return to them in extended business and profits. If for revenue, they will endeavor to evade their just taxes and throw the burden upon the people in the shape of tariff taxes upon the necessaries of life.

In the Associated Press dispatch of March 3 from Berlin, published in the Washington Star, Arthur Gwinner, director of the Deutsche Bank, estimates that the year's return to the Government from the tax on war profits will net the German Government 500,000,000 marks, or about $140,000,000. This is based on the war profits of 53 companies reporting, of which 35 show taxable margins of increase over ante bellum periods. It is evident that on the immense volume of war profits now being reaped in this country the German tax would show vastly greater results.

So long as the present European war lasts it would appear that a tax on war profits alone would amply support our preparedness program. The reason for adding the income and inheritance tax to the revenue program is that we may have revenue to continue our preparedness program to a reasonable degree of perfection in the event that the European war ends before our program is complete.

So far as a customs tariff is concerned as a reliance for increased revenue, as proposed by some of our friends of the minority, I have just this much to say:

First. That to saddle upon the people of this country in the shape of tariff taxes upon the necessaries of life a burden of revenue to maintain a military and naval program, and thereby exempt from taxation the colossal special interests which will reap a harvest of dividends from that program, would be an outrage not deserving of serious discussion on this floor.

Second. That when the experience of every country on the face of the globe at this time proves what is patent on its face, namely, that customs duties take wings in time of war and are never to be depended upon for such purpose, it is absurd and preposterous to propose them at this time for preparedness revenue.

Justice to the American people—the principle that the beneficiaries shall pay the assessment—as well as every precept of practicable taxation, require that war profits and preparedness profits should meet the cost of preparedness. And on this principle I ask for a vote on this resolution—the only principle which, in my mind, will justify taxation for an extended military and naval program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the rural credit system.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution providing for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army in an emergency.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4657. An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 16, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Interior of March 13, 1916, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $26,055 for the reconstruction and repair of mine-rescue cars for the Bureau of Mines, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 901); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior of March 13, 1916, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the service of the fiscal year 1917 in the sum of $153,850 for the installation of hydroelectric power plant in Yosemite Valley, Yosemite National Park (H. Doc. No. 902); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H.
